3d. If it be attempted to confine the action of the Government to works of a national and not local character—a distinction, the disregard of which "would of necessity lead to the subversion of the federal system"—yet, in the language of the President, by whom this distinction is referred to, "that even this is an unsafe one, arbitrary in its nature, and liable, consequently, to great abuses, is too obvious to require the confirmation of experience." To this it may be added, that endless and vexatious disputes would arise in Congress, and between Congress and the Executive, in determining what is national and what is local. Each branch must, of consequence, act upon its own arbitrary opinion. One Congress may commence a work as national, and a succeeding Congress may think it local, and withhold the appropriation to complete it. So, one President may give his sanction to a particular measure as national, and his successor, considering it as local, may withhold his approval. There is no criterion or fixed rule by which the question can be settled or satisfactorily determined.

4th. It disturbs and destroys that harmony which should ever prevail in our legislative councils.

5th. If the system continues on the present plan, the representatives of the people, instead of acting for the general interests of the whole, are to be engaged in a disreputable scramble for the public money, each acting with a view solely to the sectional and local interests of his immediate constituents.

6th. A necessary consequence of the objections stated will be unequal and unjust appropriations of the public money, even in those sections of the Union whose representatives may advocate the policy. Is it just, for instance, that New York, Pennsylvania, and other States, who have already taxed their own citizens to make their own internal improvements, should now be required to submit to the collection of additional taxes, levied on their citizens by the Federal Government, to make improvements in other States? The inequality, is, however, more strikingly illustrated, when we look to those sections of the Union whose representatives either doubt the existence of the power, or think it inexpedient to exercise it; who cannot, consistently with their opinions, engage in the general scramble for their share, and whose constituents, therefore, who equally contribute to supply the treasury with money, do not participate in the appropriations for these objects. Thus, a very large portion of the Union, in numbers and in geographical extent, which contributes at least its equal proportion of the taxes for the support of Government and the payment of the debt, are compelled to see the national treasure, instead of being applied to the legitimate objects for which it was raised, unequally disbursed, and often improvidently squandered on objects of mere local improvement, no portion of which ever returns to large sections of country, whose inhabitants have been taxed to pay it.

The distribution of the surplus which may at any time remain in the treasury, among the States, in some fixed, rateable, and equitable proportion, it is believed, would be exempt from these objections; and to this extent, if it be the future policy of the Government to prosecute works of this kind, it would be the preferable mode.

The objections which have been made to the plan of distribution, and the answers to them, as stated by the President, have received the attentive consideration of the committee, and they come to the conclusion that "the nature of the subject does not admit of a plan wholly free from objection."

The committee do not understand the President as recommending the creation of a surplus for the purpose of distributing it out again among the people or the States; but they understand the recommendation to proceed upon the idea that it may not be possible, in reference to other great interests in the country, so to adjust our system of revenue, until a remote period, as not to leave a surplus in the Treasury over the current demand; and, in that event, the proposition to provide in time for its distribution, by constitutional amendment, (if amendment be deemed necessary,) although admitted to be attended with many difficulties, is submitted by him for the "discussion and dispassionate consideration" of Congress, as a plan preferable to any of those heretofore attempted to be practised on.

The committee can readily perceive the difficulty, and indeed impossibility, of devising any system of revenue, whether levied in the shape of direct or indirect taxes on the people, that shall make the receipts into the Treasury, for any given period of time, precisely equal to the expenditures. Our revenue is at present collected in the shape of indirect taxes on the people, by duties on imports, and by the sales of the public lands—the amount of ther of which for a given period cannot be foreseen or known. The safety of the Government, and the public credit, may at all times require a small annual excess of receipts over the current expenditures, to meet exigencies, public defalcations, and unforeseen contingencies. But though this must be the case, it is believed that there is nothing to justify the imposition of an additional, and perhaps onerous, tax on the people, not wanted for the ordinary and useful or necessary purposes of the Government in its ordinary functions, but for the purpose avowed at the time of levying the tax, of creating a surplus fund to be divided out again among the people or the States. Nor do the committee so understand the Executive recommendation. That no such surplus fund should be collected from the people, to be divided out again among the people, is evident from the consideration alone, that the expenses of collection and disbursement must be paid; and to that extent the substance of the people is drawn from them, and, in the end, they receive, in the distribution, after having been deprived of the use of it for a time, nothing more than their own money, diminished in amount. This would be the case upon the supposition that the taxes were contributed equally by the people of each State, ascertained on the basis of representation, which, in the very nature of things, cannot possibly happen in a Government like ours, embracing within its limits such a variety of climate, population, and productions, and giving rise to such a variety of pursuits in its different parts. But whether the taxes be levied equally or unequally on the people, the committee have no hesitation in giving it as their opinion, that, after the public debt shall have been paid off, no more money should be drawn into the Treasury from the people than shall be necessary for the proper and legitimate administration of the Government. They fully accord with the President in the sentiment expressed in his message of the 27th of May last, returning, with his reasons for its rejection, the Maysville road bill, to the House of Representatives, that, however important improvements are admitted to be, they are not the only objects "which demand the fostering care of the Government. The preservation and success of the republican principle rest with us. To elevate its character, and extend its influence, rank among our most important duties; and the best means to accomplish these desirable objects are those which will rivet the attachment of our citizens to the Government of their choice, by the comparative lightness of their public burthens, and by the attraction which the superior success of its operations will present to the admiration and respect of the world." They are of opinion, further, "that the resources of the nation, beyond those required for the immediate and necessary purposes of the Government, can no where be so well deposited as in the pockets of the people." Ours was intended to be a plain and a cheap Government, not a splendid or expensive one; not one imposing unnecessary burthens on its citizens.

But it is only in the event that, after the payment of the debt, there shall be found in the Treasury an accumulating annual surplus over and above the current expenses, which the Government know not how otherwise to dispose of, that the question arises, what is to be done with it? The complaint in most Governments is, that the rulers cannot wring from their subjects money enough, and are compelled to resort to loans. In this, we shall have paid off the debt, and, in the case supposed, will have drawn from the people more money than we have any use for, for constitutional purposes; and the question of difficulty with us will be, in what manner we shall dispose of it. The obvious answer, it seems to the committee, is, to reduce the taxes to the standard of the demands of the Government for all its constitutional purposes, and leave what would otherwise be surplus in the pockets of the people. That this may be safely done, without prejudice to any other great interest of such paramount importance as to require that the whole people of the Union should be taxed beyond the amount required for the support of Government, they do not hesitate to believe.

After the debt shall have been paid, that a reduction of the taxes should be made, and, the committee believe, may be safely made, to the amount of the sinking fund at present applicable to the payment of the debt; and, in that event, there being no surplus in the Treasury, the necessity may not occur for devising a plan for its disbursement and distribution. That such a reduction of the taxes as shall be equivalent to the amount now annually applied to the payment of the debt may be made, without injuriously affecting any of the great interests of the country now protected, and to the great relief of all those who have heretofore borne the chief burthens of the debt, is not doubted. The annual sinking fund now applicable to the payment of the public debt, is ten millions of dollars, and such further sum as may at any time remain unappropriated in the Treasury. This large amount, beyond the sum required to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government, has been heretofore cheerfully paid by the people, because it was "thought to be necessary to the support of Government, and the payment of the debts unavoidably incurred in the acquisition and maintenance of our national rights and liberties." But when the debts are paid, and the necessity for the continuance of the taxes to this amount will no longer exist, will not the people demand, and will they not have a right to demand, at the hands of their representatives, a reduction of their taxes to that amount? The character of the American people is greatly mistaken, or they will make that demand. Not to do it, would be to consent to be unnecessarily taxed, for the collection of money into the Treasury, to be scrambled for by their representatives, or to be a "bone of contention," distracting our deliberations, and marring the harmony of the Union. That this reduction may be made without injuriously affecting any of the great interests of the country now protected, the committee believe may be satisfactorily demonstrated. It is stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, that the amount of duties paid into the Treasury for the preceding year, (1828,) on articles not produced, or but partially produced, in the United States, was $7,550,842 13. A total repeal of these, should this be deemed advisable, would certainly operate to the advantage of all interests, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing. If this be done, and a reduction be made of the taxes which have heretofore "borne severely upon the laboring and less prosperous classes of the community, being imposed on the necessities of life," the amount of reduction would be equal to the sinking fund, and, as the committee conceive, could operate no injury to any interest, but, on the contrary, be decidedly advantageous to all.

If, in the contingency, this should not be the case, and there should remain a surplus in the treasury to be disposed of, they concur in the opinion, that the present plan of prosecuting works of internal improvement is the "worst that could exist;" and if it shall be the future policy of the Government to employ any portion of its funds in works of this character, in any mode, the plan of distribution is, in their opinion, decidedly preferable to it. That plan, whatever it may be, they have said they believed must be by an amendment of the constitution. They do not deem it necessary, however, thus far in advance of the period when the national debt, by the observance of the most rigid economy, can be paid, to recommend to the House any plan of amendment. As by the constitution the power to propose amendments is possessed by the States as well as by Congress, they have thought it preferable simply to present their views on the whole subject, and submit it to the consideration of the States, (if, in their opinion, proper to do so,) to propose such amendments to the constitution, consistently with their respective sovereignties, vesting in the Government of the United States such additional powers as they may deem it wise and safe to confer upon it. As any such amendment would divest the States of a portion of their present power, and confer it upon the Government of the Union, there would seem to be a peculiar fitness that the proposition should originate with the parties who are about to surrender up a part of their powers. Doubtless, if any plan can be devised which shall preserve the balance of power between the respective State and Federal Governments, and which shall promise to operate for the general advantage of the whole Union, a constitutional majority of the States will adopt it as a part of the constitution. The committee are of opinion, that, in a Government like ours, it is at all times safe, and certainly wise, in all cases of a questionable or doubtful power, to apply to the people, the only true source of power, to explain, enlarge, or restrict it. And they are willing to believe that there is no State in the Union that would not prefer such a resort to the opinion of her sister States, upon a great question of constitutional doubt, to an assumption of the contested power on the part of the Federal Government, however much such assumption might be calculated to promote her immediate and local interests.

With these views, the committee submit the subject referred to them to the further consideration of the House, and of the States, not doubting that it will elicit all that deliberate consideration which its paramount importance, in all its bearings, demands.

COLUMBIA RIVER.

Letter from General Ashley to the Secretary of War.

WASHINGTON CITY, March, 1829.

SIR: You request me to communicate to you, by letter, my opinion, as it regards a military force best calculated for the protection of our Western frontier, the fur trade, and our trade and intercourse direct from Missouri and Arkansas to the Mexican provinces, &c.

In answer to your first inquiry, I will remark, that my ideas on this subject were communicated to a part of the representation in Congress from Missouri three years ago. I then did, and do yet, believe, that a mounted force is the only one that can operate advantageously in that country. This force ought, in my opinion, to consist of about five hundred mounted riflemen, who should be enlisted expressly for that service, anticipating, at the time of enlistment, the privations peculiar to it, or selections made of suitable men now in the army. These troops ought to subsist themselves, which they could do with convenience so soon as the officers become acquainted with the country in which they would have to operate. In addition to the rifle, one-half of the command should be armed with sabres. Four pieces of light artillery would be found convenient and useful. The patent rifle which I examined in your office appears in one particular to be well calculated for this service, inasmuch as it can be conveniently and quickly charged on horseback; but I have been heretofore prejudiced against this description of guns, believing that they were subject, by use, to get out of order, and could not be repaired without much difficulty. Putting, therefore, these guns out of the question, of the utility of which I know but little, I would recommend a rifle, the barrel of which should not exceed three feet in length, carrying a ball weighing about three-fourths of an ounce, and having metal sufficient to support a ball of that size. I have used the percussion locks but little, but believe them admirably well constructed for general use, but more particularly for the prairies, where severe winds and rains prevail at certain seasons of the year. Great convenience would be experienced by having every gun of the same dimensions, every spring, screw, &c. of the locks, of the same size and form. This being the case, every material of one would fit, and might be used in any one. The gunstick, or thimble rod, ought to be of large size, and of wood; iron sometimes batters the muzzle, and makes the gun shoot wild. The only difference should be in the length of the breech: some should, in this particular, be longer than others, to suit the arms of those who use them. In their weight, and in every other particular except the breech, they ought to be the same. In that case, when a man became accustomed to the use of one, he could, with the same convenience, use any one of them. The sabre will be found useful, and almost indispensable, in operations against Indians mounted on horseback, and armed with bows and arrows, which they use with great dexterity and effect. The Indians in the vicinity of the Rocky Mountains are very much in the habit of fortifying some strong point convenient to where they intend attacking their enemy, by the way of covering their retreat, if unsuccessful, and fearing pursuit. They use the same precaution when encamped, whenever they apprehend danger. When covered in this way, they fight desperately before they can be ousted. It is in cases of this kind, as well as in many others, that artillery would be found convenient.

Five hundred troops, armed and equipped as proposed, would, in my opinion, be sufficient to contend against any Indian force that could be conveniently brought against them; a much less number might be in danger of defeat, provided the Indians generally should be disposed to war against us. It seems to me that, if the Government undertake to protect the frontiers and trade in question, it ought to be done effectually. No half-way measures should be adopted; show a sufficient force in the country to put down all opposition, and all opposition will cease without shedding of blood. But show an incompetent force, which may tempt the Indians to attack and defeat it, and the result will not only be the loss of many lives and extreme mortification, but the expenditure of money to reach the object in view more than perhaps five or ten times the amount which will be necessary, should the Government pursue the proper course in the first instance. The protection to be afforded should be extended as equally as practicable to all our citizens engaged in the trade of that country, whether to Santa Fe or with the Indians. And as it cannot be expected that every caravan will be furnished an escort, let its destination be where it may, the force ought, therefore, to be sufficient to overawe the Indians, and thereby render escorts unnecessary.

It seems to me that economy of lives and money dictates this course. To operate against the Indians who have heretofore committed outrages upon our Santa Fe traders, one hundred men would be all-sufficient; but it is reasonable to suppose that the success of the offenders on this route will induce others to join them.

Let us consider the force of the Indians in that quarter who are now recognised as our enemies; those who have taken a menacing attitude, and those who are, or pretend to be, friendly, but who may be brought to action against us. In this way it may be better seen whether protection is necessary, and what that protection ought to be. The Indians south of the Arkansas river I know but little about; they are very troublesome to the Spanish settlements, and are considered dangerous in that quarter. They are charged with participating in the recent depredations on the Santa Fe route; but I am of opinion that the principal actors in these outrages, and perhaps the only ones, were the Arapahoes and the Kewas. These people reside on the head waters of the Arkansas, between the Santa Fe road and the mountains. They extend their excursions to the head waters of the Platte, and across the mountains to the Rio Colorado of the west. They can muster about five hundred warriors, and are tolerably well supplied with arms and ammunition. From many circumstances within my own knowledge, in relation to the conduct of these people, and from accounts received from some of the Santa Fe traders who were robbed last fall, I feel assured that these tribes of Indians have been the offenders. They are the particular friends and relatives of the Blackfoots, who reside on the head waters of the Missouri, and who are our most bitter enemies. These tribes keep up a constant intercourse with each other. In August, 1825, seven hundred families of the Blackfoots visited the Arapahoes, and remained with or near them until the ensuing summer. The Blackfoots have altogether among their several bands from four to six thousand warriors at least. In the course of the last eighteen months, these people have repeatedly extended their war excursions entirely across our territory west of the Rocky Mountains, and harassed, robbed, and slaughtered our citizens. They can, at any time, conveniently reinforce the Arapahoes with one or two thousand warriors. They are well armed and supplied with ammunition by the Hudson's Bay Company. Major Doherty, United States' Indian agent, has given it as his opinion that the Pawnees, who are included in his agency, have determined to wage war against us. The character of Major D., his means of information, and his knowledge of the Indian character, entitle his opinion to the greatest credit. I know, too, that the Pawnees have been dissatisfied, and have repeatedly threatened us with war. I was once with that nation more than a month at the same time, when they were very much excited. I heard their threats, and plans to execute them. Notwithstanding all these circumstances, I am inclined to believe that they are not yet prepared, and will not, therefore, yet commence hostilities. They want to feel their way, and see what will be the result of the recent depredations committed on the Santa Fe route. Should these occurrences pass unnoticed, and nothing should be done to check them, we may anticipate a war with the Pawnees at some period not far distant. When they come to that determination, they will remove (for they have nothing to bind them to their villages, where they now reside a part of each year) to the head waters of the South Branch of the river Platte, and there operate with the Arapahoes, Kewas, and Blackfoots. These several nations can muster altogether seven thousand warriors, four thousand of whom would be sufficient to take care of their women and children, while the balance of them go to war. They can subsist themselves altogether, convenient to almost any one point, from the twenty-fifth to the thirty-eighth degree of longitude, and from the northern to the southern boundary of that portion of our territory. This whole region of country abounds in buffalo and other game. Any one acquainted with the range of these animals may, if they do not find them at the spot where they wish to use them, procure them not far off. They are so numerous that it appears to me that their numbers would increase annually, even were the consumption of them twice or thrice what it now is.

By the foregoing statement, I have endeavored to give you my opinion of the force, situation, and disposition of the several bands of Indians from whom we may expect the greatest immediate danger, and also their means of subsistence in the country where their operations against us will be carried on. I will now enumerate the bands with whom we have friendly intercourse, but whose friendship, as I have before observed, is, in my opinion, very precarious. The several tribes, as far as we have extended our acquaintance west of the Rocky Mountains, can, I presume, muster from six to eight thousand warriors. They are located in different sections of that country, where our principal fur trade is carried on. On the Missouri, above the mouth of the Platte, we have the Mahaws, who can furnish about four hundred warriors; the Pancaes, two hundred and fifty warriors; the several bands of Sioux, two thousand five hundred warriors; the Shawnees, four hundred; the Arickaras, six hundred; the Mandans and Menatarees, seven hundred; the Crows, eight hundred. On the western boundary of the State of Missouri, the Osages, I suppose, can furnish one thousand warriors; the Ioways, two hundred and fifty; the Kanzas, about four hundred; and the several tribes, or parts of tribes, recently located there by the General Government, perhaps from six hundred to one thousand warriors. I, however, know but little about these last mentioned Indians: their numbers may be greater or less than I have mentioned. Agreeably to this estimate, which I feel assured will not differ in any great degree from the exact number, the whole of the tribes with whom we have intercourse within the limits of the United States, and west of the State of Missouri, can furnish about twenty-two thousand warriors, from three to four thousand of whom are located immediately upon the western border of Missouri, and within four or five days' march thereof; twelve or fifteen hundred of the number, the Pawnees, are now threatening us with war; several hundred others of this number, the late emigrants, were, a short time since, (instigated by the British Government,) slaughtering our citizens upon our Northern frontier, and continued to do so as long as that Government desired it. They had no good cause for their hostility. They lived within the limits of the territory of the United States, from which they could not retreat without the support of the British, and they well knew that when that Government ceased to provide for them, they would again be dependent upon the United States for territory on which they could subsist themselves. Notwithstanding all these circumstances, calculated to induce them to cultivate our friendship, or at least to observe a neutral course, at the first suggestion of the British, they raised the tomahawk against us. What faith can be placed on the friendship of these people? They well know that they may at any time repeat their depredations upon us with impunity; that, should the United States provide the means to punish them, they can sue for peace at any time, with a certainty of obtaining it, and of being restored to their former homes and privileges. Under such circumstances, what have they to fear from repeating their outrages upon us? And how different is the situation of these Indians now from what it was upon our Northern frontier before the late war. Located upon our Western frontier, where in their rear they have a wilderness of fifteen hundred miles in extent, peculiarly adapted to the use of Indians, the greater portion of it literally covered with buffalo and other game, strongly fortified by nature with the Rocky Mountains, where their retreat can be safely covered, without a strong force to oust them; and behind their natural fortifications, they have their old friends, the British emissaries, preparing materials for rekindling the war fires, should it become necessary. If these Indians should ever be again disposed to raise the tomahawk against us, (and I have not the least doubt of it,) they cannot desire a more eligible position than they now occupy.

The facts generally herein enumerated are not stated as information coming from others, but from my own personal observations. The conclusions which they have led me to, must, I think, appear reasonable to all who will properly consider them. If so, it must forcibly appear that our Western frontier, and our citizens engaged in their lawful and laudable pursuits in that country, want the protection of the General Government; and that not less than five hundred troops, equipped as proposed, will afford that protection. Our citizens immediately interested in the country in question, ought reasonably to expect this protection as a matter of right; and the Government ought, in my opinion, to feel the reasonableness of their claim as a matter of course.

The military command, as proposed, should not be stationary at any one point, but traverse the country from place to place, wherever the good of the service may seem to require. In this way, the officers might acquire a knowledge of the country in which they would have to operate, and also the Indian character, where it could be done leisurely, and without injury to the troops. The latter would be necessary, and the former almost indispensable, because such is the situation of the country, that the safety of the command might, in some degree, depend upon this information; for instance, there are sections of the country for fifty to one hundred miles in extent, in pursuing certain directions, entirely without water, and other portions of it almost equally destitute of subsistence for men or horses. There are also inaccessible mountains, offering appearances of easy access, which would cause great fatigue and delay in attempting to cross them; while others, of much more rugged appearances, can be easily penetrated, when their avenues are well known. These, and numerous other circumstances of equal importance, require that the officer commanding troops in that country should have a knowledge of them before expeditious movements through the country should become indispensable. The troops, too, by moving about as proposed, would be daily acquiring a knowledge of their duty, having so frequently to harness their horses, cross large and difficult rivers, securing camps on different situations, and in a variety of ways become much more efficient in the service. When it might not be necessary for this command to winter elsewhere, they might take up their winter quarters on our Western frontier, where they could be subsisted cheap, and, if necessary, afford protection to our frontier. In compliance with your request in relation to my manner of equipping and moving parties of men through the Indian country in the course of my general excursions to the Rocky Mountains, I will observe, that, as mules are much the best animals for packing heavy burthens, each man has charge of two of them for that purpose, and one horse to ride. The equipage of each horse or mule consists of two halters, one saddle, one saddle blanket, one bear-skin for covering the pack or saddle, and one packstrap for the purpose of binding on the pack, and a bridle for the riding horse. One of the halters should be made light for common use, of beef hide, dressed soft; the other should be made of hide dressed in the same way, or tanned rope, sufficiently strong to hold the horse under any circumstances, and so constructed as to give pain to the jaws when drawn very tight. The rein of each halter should not be less than sixteen feet long. A stake made of tough hard wood, about two inches in diameter, and two feet long, with an iron socket, pointed at one end to penetrate the earth, and at the other end a band of iron to prevent its splitting, should be provided, to be used when in the prairies, with the halter last described; this stake, when well set in the ground, will hold any horse.

In the organization of a party of—say from sixty to eighty men, four of the most confidential and experienced of the number are selected to aid in the command; the rest are divided in messes of eight or ten. A suitable man is also appointed at the head of each mess, whose duty it is to make known the wants of his mess, receive supplies for them, make distributions, watch over their conduct, enforce order, &c. &c.

The party thus organized, each man receives the horse and mules allotted to him, their equipage, and the packs which his mules are to carry; every article so disposed of is entered in a book kept for that purpose. When the party reaches the Indian country, great order and vigilance in the discharge of their duty are required of every man. A variety of circumstances confines our march very often to the borders of large water-courses, when that is the case, it is found convenient and safe, when the ground will admit, to locate our camps (which are generally laid off in a square) so as to make the river form one line, and include as much ground in it as may be sufficient for the whole number of horses, allowing for each a range of thirty feet in diameter. On the arrival of the party at the camping ground, the position of each mess is pointed out, where their packs, saddles, &c. are taken off, and with them, a breastwork immediately put up, to cover them from a night attack by Indians: the horses are then watered and delivered to the horse guard, who keep them on the best grass outside and near the encampment, where they graze until sunset, when each man brings his horses within the limits of the camp, exchanges the light halter for the other more substantial, sets his stakes, which are placed at the distance of thirty feet from each other, and secures his horses to them. This range of thirty feet, in addition to the grass the horse has collected outside the camp, will be all-sufficient for him during the night. After these regulations, the proceedings of the night are pretty much the same as are practised in military camps. At daylight (when in dangerous parts of the country) two or more men are mounted on horseback, and sent to examine ravines, woods, hills, and other places within striking distance of the camp, where Indians might secrete themselves, before the men are allowed to leave their breastworks to make the necessary morning arrangements before marching. When these spies report favorably, the horses are then taken outside the camp, delivered to the horse guards, and allowed to graze until the party have breakfasted, and are ready for saddling. In the line of march, each mess march together, and take their choice of positions in the line according to their activity in making themselves ready to move, viz. the mess first ready to march moves up in the rear of an officer who marches in front of the party, and takes choice of a position in the line, and so they all proceed until the line is formed; and in that way they march the whole of that day. Spies are sent several miles ahead, to examine the country in the vicinity of the route; and others are kept at the distance of a half a mile or more from the party, as the situation of the ground seems to require, in front, rear, and on the flanks. In making discoveries of Indians, they communicate the same by a signal or otherwise to the commanding officer with the party, who makes his arrangements accordingly. In this way I have marched parties of men the whole way from St. Louis to the vicinity of the Grand Lake, which is situated about one hundred and fifty miles down the waters of the Pacific ocean, in seventy-eight days. In the month of March, 1837, I fitted out a party of sixty men, mounted a piece of artillery (a four pounder) on a carriage which was drawn by two mules; the party marched to or near the Grand Salt Lake beyond the Rocky Mountains, remained there one month, stopped on the way back fifteen days, and returned to Lexington, in the western part of Missouri, in September, where the party was met with every thing necessary for another outfit, and did return (using the same horses and mules) to the mountains by the last of November, in the same year.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

W. H. ASHLEY.

Gen. A. MACOMB, Commander-in-chief of the Army of the U. States, Washington City.

CULTURE OF SILK.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the letter of Peter S. Du Ponceau, Esq., presenting to the House a flag of American silk and manufacture, made the following report:

The Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the letter of Peter S. Du Ponceau to the Speaker of the House, announcing his presentation to the House of a silken flag bearing the colors of the United States, made of American silk, reeled from cocoons, and prepared and woven by John D'Homergue, silk manufacturer, the entire process in the manufacture of the same having been performed in the city of Philadelphia, report:

That they consider this specimen of American industry applied, for the first time, to the production of a fabric in such general use in the United States, in the purchase of which, in foreign countries, several millions of dollars are annually drawn from this country, as highly auspicious to the agriculture and arts of the United States; and that Mr. Du Ponceau, for his patriotic exertions in promoting the culture of silk, and in his efforts to excite the attention of the people of the United States to that important branch of industry, deserves the commendation of his country. The committee have received a communication from Mr. Du Ponceau, detailing various important facts and remarks in reference to the bill entitled "An act for promoting the growth and manufacture of silk," which they have appended to this report for the information of the House; and the committee report a resolution, and recommend its adoption by the House.

Resolved, That the flag bearing the colors of the United States, presented to this House by Peter S. Du Ponceau, of Philadelphia, made of American silk, and prepared and woven by John D'Homergue, silk manufacturer, in the city of Philadelphia, be accepted by this House, and that it be displayed, under the direction of the Speaker, in some conspicuous part of the hall of sittings of this House.

PHILADELPHIA, December 7, 1830.

SIR: You will receive with this letter a silken flag, bearing the colors of the United States. This flag is made entirely of American silk, reeled from the cocoons, prepared and woven by Mr. J. D'Homergue, silk manufacturer. The coloring has been done by the best artist he could procure in the city of Philadelphia, he himself not professing to be a dyer.

The staff of this flag, with the eagle, measures about fifteen feet; the flag itself is twelve feet and a half long, and six feet wide. It is woven all in one piece, without a seam.

I beg, sir, you will be so good as to present this flag most respectfully, in my name, to the honorable House over which you preside, as a sample of American industry, thus applied for the first time to the most valuable of American productions, and as a result of the efforts they have made during the last five years for the promotion of the important branch of agriculture to which we owe the rich material of which this flag is composed.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant,

PETER S. DU PONCEAU.

HON. ANDREW STEVENSON,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PHILADELPHIA, December 13, 1830.

SIR: The bill for promoting the growth and manufacture of silk, which was reported by you, in the name of the Committee on Agriculture, to the House of Representatives of the United States, at their last session, having been unavoidably postponed, in consequence of the pressure of other business, I have availed myself of the opportunity of the recess to cause experiments to be made, and collect as many facts as has been in my power, in order to throw as much additional light as possible on a subject which may be considered, in a great degree, as new in this country, and on which, at least, very little practical experience has been yet obtained.

I thought it my duty so to do, in order to justify the confidence with which the committee were pleased to honor me, by giving implicit credit to the statement of facts which I laid before them, and by adopting and recommending to Congress the plan which, at their request, I submitted, as the best calculated to promote the important object which they had in view. In many respects I rejoiced that that opportunity was given me by the postponement of the bill. I have proceeded at my own risk, as if the bill had been actually passed, and one year has been gained of the three years which its enactments required.

I began with causing to be printed, in a pamphlet form, two hundred copies (one hundred in the English, and as many in the French language) of the report, in part, of the Committee on Agriculture of the 12th of March last, with my letter to you annexed, which I transmitted to my correspondents in different parts of Europe, in order to elicit opinions and obtain every possible information. They made their way as far as Vienna, in Austria, whence I have lately received a valuable treatise on the culture and manufacture of silk. What effects they produced elsewhere, will be mentioned in the course of this letter.

I then went with M. D'Homergue to the State of Connecticut, where the culture of silk has been pursued for the last seventy years. We remained five days in the town of Mansfield, where the greatest quantity of cocoons are raised, which they make into sewing silk. There we were much surprised to find the country poor in the midst of riches. It abounds in mulberry trees of the best species, which might feed, according to M. D'Homergue, a much greater quantity of silkworms than are raised there. The soil is excellent for the production of that tree, and silkworms prosper there, though they are raised without any extraordinary degree of care. The cocoons are very fine, and their silk excellent; yet, the people of that district are far from being rich, and money is very scarce among them. The chief advantage that they appear to derive from their sewing silk is, that it serves them as a kind of circulating medium—skeins of silk of a size regulated by their acts of Assembly supplying the place of coin and bank notes, through a pretty large extent of country. If they knew how to prepare their silk for exportation, or for the manufacture of those light stuffs that are so much in use through the United States, their condition, I think, would be much improved by more profitable sources of gain, and a greater influx of money. I found in that State a disposition to extend the culture of silk; and large orders have even been sent from thence to this city for the purchase of mulberry plants.

On my return home, I caused ten reels to be made on an improved plan of M. D'Homergue's, much simplified from that of Piedmont, and which were found to work extremely well. I also caused a convenient shed to be erected for the filature, under which the reels were placed, with their furnaces and other necessary apparatus.

On my leaving Connecticut, I had left orders to an agent to purchase a large quantity of cocoons. From some misunderstanding, it happened that that order was not executed in time, so that I obtained from thence a much less quantity than I expected.

By means of advertisements in the newspapers, inserted, however, too late in the season, and not extensively enough, I obtained cocoons, in various quantities, from the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, and North Carolina; a few were sent to me even from the States of Mississippi and Louisiana. From the last of these States, and from South Carolina, I would have received some considerable quantities, if the rivers had been navigable in the interior. On the whole, I could only collect, during the last season, about four hundred and twenty pounds of various qualities; but I have no doubt, that, next year, by taking proper measures in due time, a sufficient quantity may be obtained for any reasonable purpose, and that quantity will be increasing every year. Although the reeling season is over, I am still receiving some from different parts of the Union. The last I have purchased came from the vicinity of Richmond, in Virginia, and I expect every day six bushels from South Carolina. I found no difficulty in procuring women to work at my experimental filature; they offered themselves in abundance, and those whom I employed were well pleased with the business: they like it much better than working in the cotton factories, because the labor is lighter, and they have the advantage of the open air; for silk cannot be reeled to advantage in a close room. That work must be done under a shed, into which the air has full and free access on all sides, except where the sun shines with too much power; and that is provided against by curtains or sliders.

I employed, at first, six, and gradually, afterwards, so many as twenty women at the reels, who have acquired more or less skill in the art of winding silk from the cocoons, and, in general, did very well under direction. M. D'Homergue praises very highly the adroitness and intelligence of the females of this country; and has no doubt but that they will, in time, make excellent reelers.

With the aid of these women, M. D'Homergue made, in the course of the season, about fifty pounds of fine raw silk. When we consider the small quantity of cocoons out of which this was made, that a large portion of them were bad ones, and the considerable waste that must have resulted from the want of skill of women just initiated in the art, it will be seen that the superiority ascribed to American silk is not imaginary, but has a real and solid foundation.

While these operations were going on, every decent person who wished it, was admitted to see the filature, and the manner in which the women were proceeding in their work. Nothing was done in secret; it was, on the contrary, the wish of M. D'Homergue, and my own, that every thing should be open to the public eye. Nor were our women bound by any kind of engagement, to make a secret of the knowledge they acquired, or not to hire themselves to others if they thought proper. They were left perfectly free, and are so still, now that the season is at an end, and that they are no longer in our employ. At the same time, sir, it is but fair to say, that they have not yet reached that proficiency in the art which would enable them to profit by their labor, without being under the direction of a person skilled in the business. The time will come when they will be able to set up for themselves small domestic filatures; larger ones must always be carried on under the inspection of men; otherwise, they will ruin those who undertake them. It is in large filatures that women are to be instructed, so as to spread the art in the required degree of perfection through the land.

It had been my wish to have made at least one hundred and fifty pounds of raw silk, in order to make a fair trial of the respective markets of England, France, and Mexico; but I soon discovered that it would be impossible in the first season, and therefore I determined to put the silk to another test. It was evident that, if it could be manufactured here into fine stuffs, to an equal, or nearly equal, degree of perfection with those imported from Europe, it might be also manufactured elsewhere, and therefore there could be no defect in the mode of reeling it. I therefore engaged M. D'Homergue to weave several tissues out of part of the silk that he had reeled, and the result was perfectly satisfactory. As a sample of that result, I have had the honor of presenting the flag of the United States to the honorable the House of Representatives; as it will be no doubt accessible to the public eye, it does not belong to me to pass judgment upon its workmanship. Part of the machinery with which it was woven was made on a model imported by me from Europe for the purpose.

Thus, sir, while I only meant to show to the nation the importance of the art of reeling, and the ability of M. D'Homergue in that branch of the silk business, circumstances, which I had not foreseen, have led me to demonstrate also the possibility, nay, the facility, of introducing among us the manufacture of those fine stuffs for which we pay so large a tribute annually to Europe; so that our citizens will have the choice of exporting or manufacturing their raw silk, as experience shall show to them the advantage of either.

Nothing proves better the excellence of American silk than that the various webs which M. D'Homergue has woven out of it, have not undergone the operation which is called throwing or throwsting, and yet that their texture possesses the necessary evenness and strength. To understand this fully, some explanation is necessary; and I beg to be excused for briefly stating the different processes which silk undergoes in Europe, from the cocoon to the web.

1. The first and most essential operation is that of reeling. It is performed by women, either by themselves, in their domestic filatures, or in large filatures, under the inspection of men capable of directing them. The men never reel, but merely superintend the work of the women, to make them produce, in their highest perfection, the various qualities of raw silk required for the different manufactures.

2. From the filature the silk goes to the silk throwster, to be thrown, as it is called. The throwster, partly by the aid of women, and partly of men or boys, winds, cleans, doubles, or unites more than two threads together into one. These operations are performed by means of a complicated machinery, called a throwsting mill, to which are added, as parts of its necessary apparatus, winding, cleaning, and doubling or trammings engines. Silk, thus prepared, is called throwing silk. If the silk has been badly reeled, the greatest part of it goes to waste in the operation of throwing; for the twisting machine, operating with the same degree of force through the whole length of the threads, if they are unequal (which is the common defect of silk unskillfully reeled) the same force which only twists the strong parts, breaks the weak ones, and thus the silk is wasted, and great loss follows. By these operations the silk acquires consistency and strength, and becomes fit for weaving after being dyed.

3. From the throwster the silk goes to the dyer, to receive the impression of colors. The dyer begins with boiling the thrown silk, in order to free it from a quantity of gum which still adheres to it; that done, he plunges it into his vats or kettles, to give it coloring. From the dyer it is sent to the weaver, who manufactures it into different stuffs.

No silk in Europe, as I am informed, is boiled or dyed, without being first thrown; otherwise, it is said, it would become furzy, and unfit for weaving.

The silk manufactured by M. D'Homergue has been boiled, dyed, and woven, without being thrown; and it does not appear at all deficient in evenness or regularity of the threads. I do not mean to say, however, that American silk will not be improved by passing through the hands of the throwster; still, it is a remarkable quality that it possesses, that it can, without it, produce such stuffs as M. D'Homergue has exhibited. It proceeds from the strength and nerve of the material, which are the great characteristics of the silk of this country.

For all the operations above mentioned, except that of reeling, there is no danger of competent workmen being at any time wanting in the United States. A number of silk manufacturers, such as throwsters, dyers, weavers, and even machine makers, have arrived in our seaports, in the course of the present year, from various parts of Europe, but chiefly from England, expecting to find here encouragement for their business. Several have inquired of me where they could get employment; and finding none for want of raw silk, most of them have betaken themselves to the cotton manufactories. There is no doubt that many more will come in consequence of the general excitement which the culture of silk has produced in this country, and also because it is well understood that the silk manufactories are in a declining state in England, as well as in France, whereby many workmen are thrown out of employ. This was asserted to me, as to the former country, by the English manufacturers who arrived here in the course of the last season.

As to France, I need only refer you, sir, to the memorial from the merchants of Lyons to their Government, which I had the honor of communicating to the committee during the last session of Congress, where the fact is clearly and distinctly stated; and you will recollect that this decline is chiefly attributed to a great deal of silk badly reeled being brought to the market. Another very remarkable fact will corroborate this assertion. I am informed by my French correspondents, that, as soon as the report of the committee of the 12th March last, with my letter to you, reached Nismes, (a considerable silk manufacturing town in the South of France, in which there are several extensive filatures,) the Chamber of Commerce of this city called a meeting of the merchants of the department of Gard, in which it is situated, to consider the expediency of petitioning the French Government to adopt for France the plan which that letter suggests, to wit, the establishment of a school for the instruction of young men, to enable them to become directors of filatures. The meeting was appointed for the first of August last. The revolution which took place at Paris at the latter end of July, and which was attended, at Nismes, with considerable disturbance and bloodshed, by compelling the peaceable inhabitants to fly the city, prevented that assembly from taking place; but I am informed that it is not lost sight of, and that the plan will be resumed as soon as possible. In the mean time, my letters also inform me that an eminent lawyer has been employed to draught the intended petition, and the cities of Lyons and Avignon have been invited to join in the measure.

Such is the importance that is attached in France to the art of reeling silk; and I ought to mention here, that, notwithstanding the great influx into this country of silk manufacturers, of every description, not one reeler has appeared, either male or female; and this comes in support of what I have stated in my former letter respecting the difficulty of obtaining such.

Eighteen months have elapsed since M. D'Homergue arrived in this country, at the instance of a society who well understood the importance of the art of reeling. Almost immediately on his arrival, he published his essays, in which he threw all possible light upon the subject: those essays have circulated in America and Europe. The Legislature of the Union have thought them worthy of their particular attention; and yet no reeler, except M. D'Homergue, has appeared in the United States, while silk manufacturers, of other descriptions, have come here in numbers from various parts of Europe.

Thus, sir, with the exception of reeling, the United States have all the arts at hand that are necessary for carrying on silk manufactures, for which they only want the raw material properly prepared. I should add that the men who profess those various arts are all in search of labor, and that there is danger of their taking to manufacturing foreign silks, to the great detriment of that of our country. The republic of Mexico offers a striking example of what may happen here. In that country, they manufacture a very great quantity of sewing silk, besides shawls, and some other articles. They have imported foreign manufacturers, who taught them their arts; but they neglected the planting of mulberry trees, and raising silk worms, although their soil and climate are admirably calculated for these purposes. The silk they manufacture is imported from abroad, chiefly from China, and a great deal of it passes through this country on its way to them. This sufficiently explains the large importations of raw silk which annually take place in the United States. It appears from the treasury reports, that, in the year which ended on the 30th September, 1828, raw silk was imported into this country to the amount of $608,709, which amount, converted into silk stuffs, would produce several millions, but would, at the same time, destroy the hopes of our agriculturists. By manufacturing foreign silks, the Mexicans encourage their manufactures and commerce at the expense of agriculture. I am told, however, that they are beginning to plant mulberry trees in the neighborhood of Acapulco, on the Pacific; but it is probable they will not succeed for want of good reelers, and because bad habits, when once fixed, are with difficulty laid aside. I think there is danger of the same thing taking place in this country. Some coarse articles have already been made in New York, out of foreign silks, and offered for sale there and in this city.

The English, it is true, have enriched themselves by the manufacture of silk, although their country does not produce the raw material, which they are obliged to import from abroad; but there is no doubt that they would be much richer if they raised it at home. Of this they are very sensible, and it is evident from the efforts they made to introduce the culture of silk into the United States while British colonies. They raise a great deal of it in their possessions in Bengal, which is said to be the finest in the world, but it comes to Europe badly reeled and otherwise ill prepared, and therefore is considered inferior to all others. (See the Manual published under the authority of the House of Representatives, in 1828, p. 172.) In addition to this, and in support of the importance of good reeling, I beg leave to insert here the statement of an English silk broker, communicated in a letter from the respectable house of Rathbone, Brothers, & Co. of Liverpool, to a gentleman of South Carolina, who published it in the Sumpter Gazette of the first of May last: "Although," says the writer, "our importations from the East Indies are great, and this trade of vital importance to our successful competition with the continent, it is to be regretted that neither the East India Company nor the private merchants have hitherto employed any competent persons to superintend the reeling of the silk; if that was done, I have not the slightest doubt but that silks of the Eastern production would render us altogether independent of France or Italy; for it is an established fact that silk of the best quality can be produced in the East Indies at a lower rate than in Europe."

It is also an established fact that America produces silk of the best quality; and experiments have shown that M. D'Homergue possesses the necessary qualifications for directing a filature, and for giving instruction in the art of reeling. In addition to the evidence which results from these experiments, I beg leave to state that, in the course of last summer, some small samples of Philadelphia raw silk, reeled by M. D'Homergue, were sent to Lyons and Nismes, in both of which places it was much admired. At Lyons, the Chamber of Commerce caused the samples to be submitted to the proper tests by a sworn assayer, who pronounced it well reeled; and in the account of these proceedings, which was inserted in a Lyons newspaper called the Pre-curseur, it was said to be worth there twenty-six francs (five dollars) a pound. At Nismes it was estimated at thirty francs. I have no doubt that it will produce at least those prices in our seaports, to which it is understood that orders will be sent from France as soon as it is known that it may be obtained in sufficient quantities. In England, the prices of silk follow pretty nearly those of France. In Mexico, our raw silks of the second and third quality are most in demand, and will produce good prices. It is a remarkable fact that they lay heavy duties there on the importation of raw silk, which they manufacture and do not produce. With this system, they are not likely soon to rival us, if we should adopt one capable of bringing our native resources into full activity.

The only system, in my opinion, that will produce that effect, is the introduction of a good method of reeling silk, and its equal dissemination through the United States. This done, every thing else will follow. The agriculturist will raise cocoons, because he will find purchasers; and the raw silk will be purchased by the foreign agents, or employed by the manufacturer at home. I have received several letters from North and South Carolina, informing me that a great many cocoons are raised there, but that, for want of a market, they are devoured by rats and insects. A lady writes to me that she has lost this year, in that way, near one hundred bushels. A general desire is expressed, from one end of the United States to the other, to see this rich production turned to a profitable account. I have received numerous letters to that effect from almost every State in the Union. The excitement in favor of the silk culture appears to me to be general, and numbers are preparing to apply themselves to it.

It remains now with Congress to take such measures as they shall think most proper for the attainment of that object. In making experiments and collecting facts, in order to throw some more light upon the subject, I have done my duty as a citizen, anxious for the welfare of his country. The committee will please to recollect that I have not obtruded upon them my opinions or my advice; and that, in addressing them at the last session, I only yielded to the most flattering invitation. At present, it is a duty that I owe to them, as well as to myself, to support, by facts, the theory that I have advanced, and which they have sanctioned by their approbation.

I have only to add, that M. D'Homergue persists in the offer he made of his services, and I in that of my gratuitous assistance. Should the bill proposed by the committee be brought again to the consideration of Congress, it is to be observed that three years are no longer required, and that M. D'Homergue will be ready to begin the instruction of the sixty young men on the first of July next. This will require an alteration in the terms of payment of the forty thousand dollars. He suggests four equal half-yearly instalments, the first to be immediately after the passing of the act.

It is with pleasure that I mention that M. D'Homergue, having inspected several of our manufacturing establishments, has been astonished at the proficiency that this country has made in mechanics and the mechanical arts, which will, in a great degree, supersede the necessity of importing machinery from abroad, when the same effect can be obtained here from the ingenuity of our workmen.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration and respect, sir, your most obedient and very humble servant,

PETER S. DUPONCEAU.

Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives U. S.

ASSAYS OF FOREIGN COINS.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES,

Philadelphia, January 31, 1831.

SIR: Conformably to general instructions from the Treasury Department, assays have been made of the following foreign coins, the result of which is now respectfully submitted.

GOLD COINS.

From the assayer's report, it appears that the gold coins of Great Britain and Portugal contain 22 parts of fine gold in 24 parts; those of France 21 19-32 parts of fine gold in 24 parts; and those of Spain 20 63-64 parts fine in 24 parts.

The value, per pennyweight, of the gold coins of Great Britain and Portugal, deduced from the above assay, is the same as that of the gold coins of the United States, viz. 88 8-9 cents; that of the gold coins of France is 87 1-4 cents; and that of the gold coins of Spain 84 78-100 cents per pennyweight.

These results are very nearly conformable to those of our previous assays of the above coins, except in regard to gold coins of Spain, which, in this instance, give a value slightly above the average of those usually obtained. It may be confidently inferred that no reduction in fineness has been made in either of the coins mentioned.

In addition to the above, assays have been made of the gold coins of Mexico and Colombia, issued in 1829, and of Central America, issued in 1827; being the latest dates procured. The result indicates an adherence, on the part of those Governments, to the gold standard of Spain; the greatest deviation from that standard not being greater than Spanish gold coins frequently exhibit. The gold coins of those new States may be estimated at 84 25-100 cents per pennyweight, which corresponds with the average value thereof, ascertained by the assays of 1826.

SILVER COINS.

Of Spanish milled dollars, no latter dates have been procured than those heretofore assayed and reported on, viz. of the year 1824. The fineness thereof may be stated at 10 oz. 15 dwts. 12 grains of fine silver in 12 ounces, conformably to previous reports. The value per ounce corresponding thereto is 116 1-10 cents. Standard silver of the United States contains 10 oz. 14 dwts. 4 5-13 grains of fine silver in 12 ounces, the value corresponding to which is 115 38-100 cents per ounce.

Specimens of the Mexican and Peruvian dollar of 1830, the Central American of 1829, and that of La Plata of 1827 and 1828, have also been submitted to examination.

The three first mentioned are found to be of the full Spanish standard; they even incline to a fineness slightly superior to the ordinary Spanish dollar, but not such as to indicate any authorized appreciation in this respect. Being of recent emission, their weight exceeds that of the dollar of Spain now in circulation. The intrinsic value of these coins may be stated at 116 1-10 cents per ounce. By tale, they may be estimated to average 100 cents 4 1/2 mills.

The specimens of the dollar of La Plata, examined in 1826, were found equal in fineness to the Mexican, though of less value by tale, by reason of their inferiority thereto in weight. On an average, they were not found to be worth more than 100 cents each.

The latest dates then examined were of 1813 and 1815.

The specimens of this coin issued in 1827 and 1828, now assayed, present results materially different from the above, and indicate a very sensible deterioration in the standard thereof. These specimens vary from 10 oz. 1 dwt. 12 grains fine silver, to 10 oz. 7 dwts. 6 grains in 12 ounces. The former is equivalent to 108½ cents per ounce, and the latter to 111 6-10 cents per ounce. The value of the former, according to their ordinary weight, will be, by tale, about 93 6-10 cents, and that of the latter 96½ cents. Nothing can be usefully affirmed of the average value of coins liable to variations of this extent.

Late deposits of large amounts in Spanish dollars, exhibit a result not observed at the mint before the latter part of the last year. They have heretofore been stated as producing on an average 100 cents 3 mills, conformably to the ascertained value of large quantities received from time to time for coinage. Recent deposits have produced less than one mill above their nominal value. This is to be attributed to the diminished average weight of those coins, arising in part from the cessation of new issues, and probably still more to the fact, that a large proportion of the Spanish dollars now remaining in the United States may be the residue of parcels from which the most perfect have been selected for the purposes of commerce and the arts.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SAMUEL MOORE.

Hon. S. D. INGHAM,
Secretary of the Treasury.

WORKERS IN IRON.

PHILADELPHIA, January 14, 1831.

I have the honor to transmit the accompanying memorial, and, on behalf of the petitioners, to request you will present the same to the House of Representatives, over which you preside.

The memorial is signed by three hundred and fifty-eight practical workers in iron, and will be found, by the members of the House from our districts, and others acquainted with the names, to contain the signatures of not only the principal, but all the intelligent master-workmen and journeymen in the smithing business, of the city and county of Philadelphia.

Several of the memorialists have been informed by iron masters, and owners of forges and furnaces, that these gentlemen themselves are at length becoming satisfied that some modification of the present ruinous tariff on iron is necessary; experience having sorely taught them that the existing exorbitant duties on the importation of the raw material, so far from increasing, actually diminishes the demand for American iron.

With the highest respect and consideration, I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

JOHN SARCHET.

To the Hon. ANDREW STEVENSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington.

MEMORIAL.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the subscribers, citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, mechanics, employed in various branches of the manufacture of iron, namely, as steam engine makers, anchor and chain smiths, shipsmiths, machinists, founders, hardware manufacturers, edge-tool makers, locksmiths, coach and wagon smiths, farriers, whitesmiths, and blacksmiths, respectfully represents:

That, at the last session of the present Congress, a number of your memorialists presented a petition to both Houses, which, in the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, and, in the House of Representatives, to the Committee of the Whole House; that, in the Senate, the Committee on Manufactures made a report thereon, printed by order of that body, which contains statements, supposed to have been made by your memorialists in the petition in question, and conclusions deduced therefrom, not conceived to be correct by your memorialists; they therefore feel satisfied that the facts referred to by the committee of the Senate have not been fully comprehended, and that the committee has thus been led into material errors, which, when clearly and distinctly pointed out, your memorialists believe, will become evident to both Houses. Your memorialists accordingly respectfully ask permission once more to exhibit to Congress, in greater detail, and with all the perspicuity they can give them, the practical facts on which they found their claim for legislative relief, accompanied by such remarks on the report of the Committee on Manufactures in the Senate as are absolutely necessary to prevent the former statements of your memorialists from being misunderstood.

First. The report of the Committee on Manufactures in the Senate, after quoting some of the statements of your memorialists, remarks: "That, as this petition is printed for the use of the Senate, and placed among our documents for future reference, if necessary, it is proper that explanations should be given, to prevent erroneous impressions, which it is calculated to make." Your memorialists believe the erroneous impressions here alluded to, to be the prices given by them, in their petition, of the cost of iron; but the committee, and not your memorialists, on this point, have fallen into error, by assuming, as the committee have done, the returns made to the Treasury Department as the basis of their calculations, when, as is well known, no distinction whatever is made in the Treasury returns between the prices of refined and common iron; whereas, in their petition, your memorialists expressly declared, that, on refined iron, manufactured by rolling, which then actually cost ten pounds sterling per ton, or, at the par value of exchange, forty-four dollars and forty-four cents, and has since fallen to nine pounds sterling per ton, the duty was eighty per cent.; and that, on common iron, which then cost six pounds sterling, or twenty-six dollars and sixty-six cents per ton, the duty was one hundred and forty per cent.; and, so far from thereby conveying "erroneous impressions," your memorialists have since ascertained that common English iron, at cargo price, was then selling at five pounds five shillings sterling, or twenty-three dollars and thirty-three cents per ton, thus making the duty actually one hundred and fifty-nine per cent., or nineteen per cent. more than your memorialists alleged in their petition. Smaller sizes of iron, such as half inch, either square or round, and under, are subject to a duty of seventy-eight dollars and forty cents per ton, the price of half inch being six pounds five shillings sterling, or twenty-seven dollars and seventy-seven cents on that size, equivalent to two hundred and eighty-two and three-quarters per cent., which, nevertheless, continues to be imported! On the smaller sizes of iron, in consequence of a difference in cost, although subject to the same specific duty, the duty actually paid is somewhat less per cent. than that on half inch iron.

As the committee of the Senate, in their report, have pronounced common English iron to be "bad," your memorialists will be excused for here inserting a set of experiments on the strength of the various malleable metals, given in the works of different French and English scientific writers on mechanics, incontestably establishing the relative cohesive properties of these metals, and fully verified by the practical experience of several of your memorialists. These experiments are on the suspension of metallic bars, one-quarter of an inch square and six inches long, and show their respective cohesive strength, expressed in the number of pounds which each bar of metal would hold, namely:

Cast steel, - - - - -	8,391 pounds.
Swedish iron, (proper to make steel of,) - - - - -	4,504 "
Other descriptions of iron - - - - -	3,492 "
Wrought copper, - - - - -	2,112 "
Cast copper, - - - - -	1,192 "
Yellow brass, - - - - -	1,123 "
Cast tin, - - - - -	296 "
Cast lead, - - - - -	114 "

By the foregoing table, it will be seen that lead, the toughest of all the metals, possesses least strength of cohesion; whilst, on the other hand, cast steel, the most brittle of the malleable metals, possesses in the highest degree strength of cohesion. Accordingly, in the application of the malleable metals to the various purposes of business, their cohesive strength, as well as their toughness, have their respective values; and in the same metal—that, for example, which your memorialists exclusively work up, namely, iron—these opposite properties are found advantageous, and are respectively turned to the best practical account. Hence, from its superior toughness, Spanish iron, by all competent judges, would be preferred for rivets, harpoons, and other articles, in which toughness is principally required; and next in point of excellence, for the same uses, the best American iron would be selected. For implements of husbandry, crow-bars, cut nails, and other articles requiring stiffness, and resistance against friction, Swedish iron is the best adapted for these purposes. For sheet and rod iron, on account of its superior ductility, Russian iron is generally preferred. English iron is preferred for various purposes, on account of the decided superiority it possesses in various qualities; in chains and anchors, from its superior strength of cohesion, its great excellence in welding or uniting, and surpassing every other known iron, both in this latter quality, and in its power of resisting rust or corrosion when exposed to the action of dampness or fresh or salt water, for more than a double period of time; in rails for railways, spikes, and bolts, on account of the superior manner in which it is prepared in all the various forms required, as well as from its acknowledged superiority in durability; and for wheel-tires, for the same properties, as well as from the greater evenness with which it is always drawn. From the various qualities above enumerated, American, Swedish, and Russian iron, all manufactured by hammering, and English and some American iron manufactured by rolling, of the common sizes, are all sold in this market at nearly the same price, to wit, at about five dollars per cwt.; Spanish iron being not much used or known here.

Secondly. Your memorialists did not mean to state, in their former petition, that the quality of the iron made in Great Britain, which sells at from sixty to sixty-two dollars and twenty cents per ton, is dependent on the hammering process, as inferred by the committee of the Senate. The quality of this, as well as of every other description of iron, arises from the purity or fineness it receives from the furnace or forge, in the application of heat, and not from the process by which it is drawn. The hammer is used in England in preparing large and irregular pieces of iron, in which the rolling process cannot be resorted to; and hence this difference of price.

Thirdly. The report of the committee of the Senate alleges that your petitioners complained of the hardship of purchasing small sizes of iron at the high price, arising from the duty of three and a half cents per pound on it; which, the committee remark, "if incurred to any considerable extent, must be altogether voluntary, as the iron may be imported in bars of a large size, and converted into those of a lesser size in this country at a very small expense;" and refer to the rolling mills "which have been in operation for several years in the county of Morris, in the State of New Jersey," and elsewhere; where, the committee assert, "common bar iron may be converted into bars and bolts, of the smaller size, at a small expense." Now, your memorialists must be permitted to say, in replying to this statement of the committee of the Senate, that the hardship they complained of, arising from the duty in question, is not, on their part, "voluntarily" incurred, and for the reasons which they proceed to give.

First—Iron of the small sizes, paying three and a half cents per pound duty, is still imported and purchased by many of your memorialists, although these small sizes, manufactured in this country, receive a bounty or "protection" equivalent to the duty. This, your memorialists clearly conceive, proves that the statement of the committee of the Senate is not borne out, and is certainly at variance with all their experience upon a point in which they cannot be mistaken; for, notwithstanding "the many mills erected for rolling iron of these small sizes," spoken of by the committee as being done "at a small expense," your memorialists still find their advantage in purchasing the imported article of the same description, subject to the heavy duty in question, as well as the other charges of importation. Secondly—Your memorialists will add, that some of them have actually paid the American manufacturers twenty-five dollars per ton for rolling iron of one inch and under into five-eighths of an inch; and from the same sizes into half an inch, thirty dollars per ton; whilst the former sizes, of five-eighths of an inch, only cost the manufacturer of hardware in Great Britain twenty-three dollars thirty-three cents per ton, and the latter sizes, of half an inch, only twenty-seven dollars seventy-seven cents. Hence it is, that, from our own present absurd duties on all sizes of rolled iron above half an inch, the British manufacturer is enabled to import into the United States, in the form of hardware, a ton of iron, at the rate of twenty-eight dollars eighty-three cents, including duty; and that, on all sizes of rolled iron of half an inch, he is also enabled to import into the United States, in the same form, a ton of iron, at the rate of thirty-five dollars thirty-nine cents, including duty; the discriminating duties, in favor of the British manufacturer, being, on all sizes of iron over half an inch, thirty-one dollars fifty cents, and, on half inch, seventy dollars seventy-seven and a half cents: the duties on hardware manufactured of the smaller sizes of iron being only one-eleventh of what they are on iron as a raw material; and on hardware made of larger sizes about one-sixth: thus excluding such of your memorialists as are engaged in the manufacture of hardware, from any thing like a fair competition with the same articles brought by the British importer into our own market! Some of your memorialists, besides, have been informed by owners of the largest and best rolling mills "in this country," that, at the present prices, they are by no means desirous to convert common bar iron into bars and bolts of the smallest sizes, notwithstanding the declaration of the committee of the Senate, that your memorialists' preference of the imported iron of this description "must be altogether voluntary."

Fourthly. The Committee on Manufactures, in their report to the Senate, refer to a part of the former petition of your memorialists, which stated that wheel-tire with holes punched in it, sheet iron cut and punched for stove-pipes, boiler plates of a size and punch for steam engine boilers, and hoop iron punched, were imported at the ad valorem duty thereon of twenty-five per cent, as "all cases of evasions of specific duties, and frauds upon the revenue;" and style this part of your memorialists' petition "an exhibition of the mysteries of trade, which must be new to the Senate;" "as an ingenious plan to evade the duties on bar iron, and, when carried into execution, a gross and palpable fraud upon the revenue." And the committee further allege, that the importation of partially manufactured wheel-tire, with holes punched in it, is "a device of the importers to evade the duties upon bar iron," which, they add, "cannot impose upon the custom-house officers, and, if it should, will no doubt be corrected as soon as made known to the Treasury Department." In reply to these allegations of the committee of the Senate, your memorialists do not feel themselves at liberty to indulge in the expression of feelings which an acute sense of justice might warrant; and the unfeigned respect they entertain for both Houses of Congress will prevent any animadversions, notwithstanding the imputations which the committee have thought proper to cast upon such of your memorialists as have been accustomed to import iron manufactured in whole or in part, in conformity, as they believe, with a just and strict interpretation of the revenue laws. Without any infraction, however, of their respect for both Houses of Congress, they may be permitted, in answer to these allegations of the Committee on Manufactures in the Senate, to observe, that the sections of the various acts now in force, imposing the duties in question, point out these distinctions, and not your memorialists; and they believe have always been so understood and applied, as only to subject iron manufactured in whole and in part, not otherwise specified, to the duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem thereon. It will be seen that the act of May 19, 1828, limits the additional ten per cent. ad valorem duty to the articles made of iron therein enumerated, and that all other manufactures of iron, not otherwise specified, remain subject to the duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem imposed by the act of May 22, 1824. Your memorialists moreover assert, without fear of contradiction, that the interpretation uniformly given to these sections of the acts in question at the custom-house, and, it is believed, with the entire sanction of the Treasury Department, has been always to allow the importation of iron manufactured in whole and in part, when not among the articles specified in the act of May 19, 1828, subject only to the ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent. imposed by the act of May 22, 1824; that this construction of these acts imposing the duty in question is entirely correct, must be obvious to both Houses of Congress, if they will refer to an act passed during the last session, regulating the importation of railroad iron, which expressly confines the application of its provisions to iron imported for railroads, thus clearly showing that Congress deemed it necessary to enact a law for the express purpose of preventing iron so imported from being applied to any other purpose except that of rails, which might have been done previous to the enactment of the said law. It is, besides, well known to all of our fellow-citizens engaged in, or practically acquainted with, the ironmongery trade, that, under the provisions of the act of May 22, 1824, imposing the ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent. on manufactures of iron not otherwise specified, and not subsequently enumerated and repealed by any of the provisions of the act of May 19, 1828, it has been the constant and uninterrupted practice, at this and other ports in the United States, to import iron, manufactured in whole or in part, under this ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent.

Fifthly. The first section of the act of May 19, 1828, provides that bar or bolt iron, when manufactured by rolling, and above half an inch diameter, shall, on its importation, be subject to a duty of thirty-seven dollars per ton; and iron of the same description, but of smaller sizes, subject to a duty of seventy-eight dollars forty cents per ton. What led the framers of the law, in this section of the act, to give such a decided monopoly to the manufactures of hardware and ironmongery at Sheffield and Birmingham, is what your petitioners are not able to state; but they know and feel that such is the effect of the provision in question. This view, moreover, can be clearly made manifest from the following statements of a few of the many articles which can be imported at and under the present cost of bar iron. By the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury of the 5th of February, 1830, transmitting statements of the commerce and navigation of the United States, &c. &c. printed by order of the House of Representatives, it will be found, at page 88 of that document, that, in the fiscal year 1828-'29, there were imported into the United States 65,896 pounds of hammers and sledges for blacksmiths, valued at $3,049, equivalent to $4 66½ per cwt., which is 33½ cents below the cost of bar iron in this market, exclusive of duty, and of which only 2,097 pounds were re-exported; so that 63,799 pounds of hammers and sledges have been imported, during the year mentioned, for the use of the American manufacturers of these very articles. Wheel-tire, which your memorialists in their former petition asserted could be imported, since that time has actually been imported, in a finished state, for about $44 17; whilst bar iron, suitable for this purpose, is now selling at about 90 dollars per ton; more than double the price of what it cost when imported in a manufactured state from a foreign country! Frying and dripping pans, both in part and in whole manufactured, are now, and ever have been, imported, duties and all other charges included, at a less price than the cost of the sheet iron. Tea trays, of large sizes, made of doubled rolled sheet iron, with only one coat of paint or japan, can be imported, duties and other charges included, at $83 72 per ton; whilst the iron required for the same purposes is selling at double the price, namely, at from $160 to $170 per ton. Tea trays of the above descriptions, therefore, can, and no doubt will be imported into the United States, to be converted into stove doors, blowers, coal scuttles, &c., as well as an almost infinite number of other articles of foreign manufacture, as a raw material, to be applied not only to the same, but various other purposes, unless the present exorbitant duties on bar, sheet, hoop, and rod iron be reduced to a uniform rate with the duty now imposed on the importation of hardware. Again—wire, No. 18, is imported, which costs four pence sterling per lb., or £37 6s. 8d. sterling per ton at par, equivalent to $165 00

The duty thereon, at ten cents per pound, is	224 00
Making the cost of a ton of wire, No. 18, duty included	$ 389 00
Knitting needles, of the same material, are imported, which cost five pence sterling per pound, or per ton equivalent to	$194 00
The duty thereon, 25 per cent. ad valorem, is	52 37
Making the cost of a ton of knitting needles, duty included,	$ 246 37

By the above statement, it is then manifest that a protection is given to the manufacturers of knitting needles at Birmingham and Sheffield, by the duty in question, amounting to $142 63 per ton; and granted, too, by the provisions of an act of Congress of the United States, in conformity, as is alleged, with the known wishes and earnest solicitations of masters and owners of American forges and furnaces, and, what is well worthy of note, believed by them calculated to protect American industry! And these observations are equally applicable to wire fenders, sieves, and every other description of manufactures from iron. Again, hammered nails, that now pay the exorbitant duty of five cents per pound, are, nevertheless, almost exclusively imported, because the present duty on nail rods is so enormous as to preclude all possibility of competition between the domestic and foreign manufacturer. This last remark the following statement will establish: The cost of 120 pounds of nail rods, at Birmingham or Sheffield, is less than six shillings and three pence sterling, or, at par, $1 37½; 120 pounds being required to produce 100 pounds of nails; that is to say, the cost of the raw material of 100 pounds of nails, viz.

120 pounds of nail rods in England, is	$1 37½
The cost of three bushels of slack, (coal,) at three pence per bushel, is	16
The present duty is five cents per pound, or	5 00
Making the cost of the raw material of 100 pounds of nails, duty included, to the English manufacturer,	6 54
On the other hand, the cost of the raw material of 100 pounds of nails, viz. 120 pounds of nail rods, in the United States, is	6 60
The cost of three bushels of coal, at 28 cents per bushel, is	84
Add to this the loss arising from difference of facility in working, from its inferior ductility, equivalent to one-tenth of the labor, say	30
Making the cost of raw material and difference of labor of 100 pounds of nails, to the American manufacturer,	$7 74

A difference, in point of cost, between English and American raw materials, for the manufacture of 100 pounds of nails, equivalent to one dollar and twenty cents. This loss to the American nailer is caused by the American iron maker not practically understanding the business. The cost of the iron, as compared with the amount of labor, profit, coal, &c. is as seven to thirty-five, or about one-fifth. At this rate, the duty on nails ought to be one-fifth on the iron, and four-fifths on the nails, to place the nailer on the same footing with the iron master; but as we have averaged the cost of the iron at one-third, and the labor and coals at two-thirds, your memorialists will pursue the same calculation. Now, three and a half cents per pound being the duty rods are subjected to, the duty on nails, at the same ratio, should be twelve cents and six mills per pound; which at once appears so extravagant, that no intelligent man, in or out of Congress, could be found its advocate. But reduce the duty on rods, the raw material, to a fair proportion with the duty now imposed on nails, and you at once transfer the making of nails from the British to the American manufacturer; and the importation of nail rods will certainly increase in the same proportion that the importation of nails will decrease; but your memorialists are further warranted in adding, that, from the increased consumption of American nails, the supply of foreign iron must necessarily be increased also. During the fiscal year 1828-9, we imported two hundred and sixty-six tons of rods made into nails; the first cost of these two hundred and sixty-six tons, in the form of rods, is known not to exceed $7,388 88; now, if your memorialists deduct this latter sum from the whole amount paid to the British manufacturer of the 266 tons, in nails, namely, 36,723 dollars, it will leave $28,336 18 cents. This last named sum, if the duties were equalized in the manner just pointed out, would give employment to as many, if not more American nailers, than it now does to the British. It is known to your memorialists, from the same inequality in the duties here alluded to, that horse shoes are actually becoming an article of importation, which heretofore have always been made by American smiths, and the cost of which, including duties and other charges, will not exceed the present price of bar iron. Hoops for water and other descriptions of casks, can be imported, duties and charges included, at 57 dollars per ton, being $21 40 less than the duty on the raw material of which they are made. Hence a cooper, by importing his hoops ready riveted, and thus saving that part of his manual labor on the hoops, can save at least one-half the cost of the article, when imported as "hoop iron," or in its state as a raw material. Thus, it appears, whether your memorialists have reference to bar iron paying 37 dollars per ton duty, or sheet iron, hoop iron, nail rods, and round or square iron, of half an inch and under, all paying $78 40 per ton, or wire paying from six to ten cents per pound, the result in each particular case will be the same, as has just been demonstrated; making it, consequently, always cheaper to import the above descriptions of iron in a manufactured than in a raw state, and thus depriving American artisans of employment, to which they are so well entitled, without injury to the consumers, to the same extent, on these descriptions of iron, and now not in any manner benefiting the masters and owners of American forges and furnaces. Your memorialists cannot perceive why the importation of one article of hardware should be considered an evasion of the specific duty on bar iron more than another, as it is equally applicable to every description whatever, whether subject to ad valorem or specific duty; and yet the committee of the Senate contend that "there are many articles of hardware upon which there should be an increase of duty, particularly upon bedscrews, mentioned in the petition," as in opposition to all the above reasoning, supported as it is by the clearest and best established facts.

Sixthly. The Committee on Manufactures in the Senate remark, that "They are of opinion with the petitioners, that there should be just proportion between the duties upon bar iron and those upon hardware; but that this proportion can be more properly attained by increasing the duties upon hardware, than by reducing them upon iron, as this, without injuring the manufacturer of iron, would protect the manufacturer of hardware; but this, it seems, the petitioners do not ask or wish." Had the committee been well acquainted with the practical effects of the duties on iron and hardware, in relation to their operation on each other, and of course that no duty on hardware, short of that on iron, could "protect," as it is called, the manufacturer of hardware; and the duty on iron has already been shown to be from 159 to 282½ per cent., or an augmentation of from six to eleven times the present rates of duties on hardware, which your memorialists would not only consider impracticable, but altogether unjust, they having no other object in the relief they now pray for, than to be enabled to bring their own industry into fair and equal competition with the foreign manufacturer, which the present exorbitant duties on the raw materials they make use of wholly prevent, and which, they trust, must, from the statements already presented, clearly appear. Your memorialists will be excused for once more repeating, that, as long as the duty on the raw material is higher than that on the manufactured article, so long will the foreign manufacturer keep possession of the market. Moreover, if the duty on hardware should be raised above its present rates, so far from benefiting any class of your memorialists, it would only tend to substitute hemp, leather, wood, and other cheap materials, for the iron which is now used. On the other hand, a fall in the prices of iron, consequent upon a reduction of duties, would materially extend its use and promote its further consumption; and thus, whilst at the same time the business of your memorialists would necessarily be increased, the whole country, in the capacity of consumers, would feel its benefits. And your memorialists will here be permitted further to remark, upon the authority of all experience, that a nation which excels in the production of cheap iron, which can only be brought about by the freest and most unlimited competition, must excel in all the useful arts.

Seventhly. The committee of the Senate state, that "They have received no information to convince them that these articles, to wit, axes, adzes, drawing knives, cutting knives, sickles, or reaping hooks, scythes, spades, shovels, bridle bits, squares of iron or steel, steelyards, scalebeams, socket chisels, vices, and wood screws, are not sufficiently protected." Your memorialists, in their former petition, did not, nor do they now, ask for any additional burden to be laid on the consumer of the above articles; but they conceive that the fact, as stated by the committee, furnishes satisfactory proof that the manufacturer of the domestic is not on as favorable a footing in the American market, as the manufacturer of the same foreign article. The committee acknowledges a duty of ninety-five per cent. on raw iron, which your memorialists believe they have already shown to be from one hundred and fifty-nine to two hundred and eighty-two and three-quarters per cent.; and at the same time the report of the committee states that they have received no evidence that the articles just enumerated are not sufficiently protected. Now, to your memorialists, nothing can be clearer than that three tons of iron in the form of hardware can be imported into the United States, as far as the duties are in question, at the same cost as one ton of iron in its raw state, according to the very statements furnished by the committee themselves. But, in point of fact, from six to ten tons can be imported in the state of hardware, for one ton in its raw state. In averaging the duty of seventy-eight dollars and forty cents per ton, with that of thirty-seven dollars per ton, supposing the duty on hardware to be thirty-five per cent., it evidently appears that the views presented by your memorialists could not have been entirely understood by the committee of the Senate.

Eightily. The committee of the Senate remark, that "There must evidently be a mistake in the statement of the petitioners, that there are annually imported sixty thousand tons of hammered bar iron." In reply, your memorialists beg leave to observe, that the committee have not clearly comprehended the views intended to be conveyed by this part of your memorialists' petition. Your memorialists have therefore now taken considerable pains in procuring documents and information from different sources, which enable them to present, as they hope, an entirely satisfactory exhibition of the same fact, or at least as far as the subject will admit of elucidation. In the first place, a quantity of iron contained in any given quantity of hardware, paying ad valorem duty, cannot be come at in any other way than by estimating it as forming an aliquot part of the first cost, which your memorialists estimate at one-third. But should it be here urged that this rate is too high, it then is manifest that your memorialists will have underrated their own labor, and consequently would be greater losers. Proceeding then on this basis, the following results are obtained, namely:

Imports of hardware, subject to an ad valorem duty of twenty-five per cent.	$2,725,430
Imports of hardware paying a duty of from thirty to forty per cent., say thirty-five per cent.	440,201
Imports of hardware paying specific duties,	180,515

The whole amount of hardware imported during the fiscal year 1828-'9, - $3,346,146

The raw material, iron, contained in the above hardware, amounted to 38,939½ tons, paying the ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. on the first cost of the iron, which was $23 33 per ton, showing that each ton of iron of this description has actually been introduced into the United States at the rate of $5 50 per ton, or within a small fraction thereof. Hence, the above 38,939½ tons must have paid, in duties, the sum of - $214,167 25

The hardware subject to specific duties contained 6,289½ tons, paying, as above stated, 35 per cent. or $8 25 per ton,	52,072 92
And 2,579 tons, paying a specific duty, say of $7 per ton,	18,033 00

tons in hardware,	$284,293 17
Had the above 47,798 tons been imported in its raw state of bar, sheet, rod, or hoop iron, the duty in that case would have been $1,568,526, estimating the duty at only $37 per ton, leaving out of consideration the duty of three and a half cents, and the first cost of hoop, sheet, and rod iron, and in both cases assuming the lowest duties, and the lowest priced iron. At this rate, the discriminating duty in favor of the British manufacturer was actually $1,284,-232 83, for the fiscal year 1828-'9. We also imported, during the same period, about 3,000 tons of sheet iron, in the form of tin plates, upon which the iron contained in these plates, tin being free, paid fifteen per cent. ad valorem, or $48,648 90. Now, had this iron been imported into the United States in the form of sheets, and had here been tinned, the duty on the iron in sheets would have been $78 40 per ton, or - $235,200 00

Whilst in tin plates it only paid the sum of - 48,648 90

Making a discriminating duty in favor of the British tinner, of - $186,551 10

During the existence of such a discriminating duty, it will be utterly impossible to embark in the tinning of iron in this country; and, it may be added, furnishes, if it were required, additional proof of the absurdity of the present exorbitant duties on the raw material. Of steel and iron wire, there were imported during the year 1828-'9, into the United States, 463,145 pounds, equivalent to 206 tons 1 cwt. 2 qrs. 2 lbs., on which article the same discriminating duty in favor of the British wire-workers has also been carefully imposed, which will be seen by reference to the previous calculations in relation to knitting needles. The following is, therefore, a recapitulation of the quantity of iron imported in the shape of hardware, with the duty thereon which it is now subject to, namely:

Hardware subject to the duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem, in which the iron paid a proportional duty of $5 50 per ton,	- 38,929½ tons
Hardware paying 35 per cent. duty, the iron paying $8 25 per ton,	6,289½
Hardware paying specific rates of duty, in which the iron pays $7 per ton,	2,579
Tin paying 15 per cent., in which the iron pays $12 50 per ton,	3,000
Wire, paying from six to ten cents per pound	206
Sheet, rod, hoop, and other descriptions of iron, paying three and a half cents per lb.	1,167½
Bar iron, rolled, paying a duty of $37 per ton,	3,332½

Making the total of the above descriptions of iron, all manufactured by the process of rolling, - 55,514½

To which add the imported hammered iron, 29,486

Making the aggregate quantity of iron imported into the United States during the year 1828-'9 amount to - 84,998½

Of which amount there have been re-exported, in all forms, - 3,654½

Showing the actual home consumption of foreign iron to be - 81,344

Now, if to this amount there also be added the quantity produced in the United States, which, according to the estimates of iron masters examined before the committee of the House of Representatives in 1828, was 30,000 tons, but which an intelligent practical man, who travelled through the United States for the express purpose of ascertaining the fact, as the result of the most careful inquiries, estimates at - 35,000

The annual consumption of iron in the United States will be - 116,344 tons.

Of these 35,000 tons produced in the United States, 10,000 tons only reach the seaboard, and, with the 81,344 tons of imported iron, make the actual quantity passing through the hands of the dealers in iron on the seaboard to be 91,344 tons, and 25,000 tons retained in the interior, there to be used. From this statement, it appears that, of rolled iron, ten-elevenths were imported in the manufactured, and the remaining eleventh in the raw state; that the quantity of rolled iron, in all its various forms, compared with hammered iron, is nearly in the proportion of two to one; that the American manufactured bar iron which comes to the seaboard, compared with the imported foreign iron in all shapes, is in the proportion of one to nine, or out of 90,000 tons only 10,000 tons; and that the American iron, compared with foreign iron imported in the state of hardware, is in the proportion of one to six, or out of 60,000 tons only 10,000 tons; which last named quantity, according to the statements of the iron masters who were examined before a committee of the House of Representatives in 1828, included every description of iron brought from the interior to the seaboard of the United States. Your memorialists unhesitatingly and solemnly affirm that the protection which has been granted by the several acts of Congress to this very inconsiderable quantity of American iron, forming, as has been shown, so small a portion of the general supply, and the greatest proportion of which is owned by some of our richest capitalists, has not only been severely and oppressively burdensome to your memorialists, as artisans and mechanics, the extent and prosperity of whose business are dependent upon the abundant and cheap supply of this important raw material, but also to all the consumers of iron, in its almost innumerable forms, throughout every part of the United States. And your memorialists will add, that the proprietors of American iron ore banks, forges and furnaces, are, by the enactments in question, themselves made to feel the folly of such restrictions, it having already been demonstrated that the effect of these enactments is to cause iron to be imported in various manufactured forms, and thus lessen the demand for this invaluable metal in a raw state, whether American or otherwise.

Eightiethly. As the committee of the Senate have pointed out to your memorialists, and may be considered as having recommended to them, to import iron in bars of a large size, to be here converted into the required small sizes by the American rolling mills, the impracticability of which has already been established, your memorialists feel authorized, under these circumstances, to submit their own views on this point, which entirely differ from those of the committee of the Senate. Instead of restricting the importation of iron, as is now done, by enormous duties on this material in its crudest raw state, your memorialists would admit pig iron entirely free, and not increase the present duties on hardware or manufactured iron, only about one-third of what they now are on the metal in its crude state. On this basis your memorialists will exhibit the following results: Pig iron, which, in Great Britain, generally sells at half the price of bar iron manufactured by rolling, may be estimated at three pounds sterling per ton, at par equivalent to $13 33.

1½ tons of pig iron, the necessary quantity to make a ton of bar, - - - - - $16 66

The whole cost of a ton of iron manufactured by hammering, when the pigs are imported free of duty, - - - - - $40 00

But, when manufactured by puddling and rolling, the cost of a ton of iron would be proportionably less. In support of the correctness of the above conclusions, your memorialists will refer to the testimony in relation to iron, given before the Committee on Manufactures in the House of Representatives, in January, 1828, by the Hon. Richard Keese and the Hon. John Mitchell, both members of the House, and by Mr. Joseph Jackson, of Morris county, New Jersey; the two former gentlemen having stated before the committee that they had been engaged in the business of making bar or bloom iron, and the latter, that he was then, and had been nearly all his life, engaged in the manufacture of iron; and all three of the gentlemen declared that they were well acquainted with the iron business. The statements about to be deduced are drawn from an average of the statements of all three of the above named gentlemen, and can be verified by reference to the minutes of evidence taken before the Committee on Manufactures, and printed by order of the House of Representatives, on the 31st January, 1828. Mr. Mitchell, it will be found, stated one hundred and seventy-five bushels of coal as the computed average for making and drawing a ton of bar iron from pigs; Mr. Keese said that five hundred bushels of coal is the usual quantity; and Mr. Jackson, eight hundred bushels the average quantity to make one ton of bar iron from the ore. By averaging these several statements, it will be seen that four hundred and seventy-five bushels of coal, at the average cost of five and a half cents per bushel, will be saved in making one ton of iron from imported pigs. It will thence follow, that in six items a saving of upwards of fifty dollars per ton will be effected by importing iron in pigs, as will be clearly exhibited by the following statement:

Pig iron, if imported, cheaper than ore, (as stated by Mr. Keese,) - - - - -	$1 83
Saving, in the quantity of coal required, in the difference between blooming and refining from the pig, four hundred and seventy-five bushels, at five and a half cents per bushel, - - - - -	24 93
Difference in cost of drawing, between the same two processes, - - - - -	9 00
Carting, and water carriage to New York, - - - - -	8 00
Storage, and other expenses, as it can be made in or so near the markets in which the sales can be effected, - - - - -	4 50
Wash ore, measuring coal, small repairs about the forge, &c. - - - - -	4 00

Amount of saving on the above six items, if the pig be imported, - - - - - $52 26

Now, if we subtract this amount from what Mr. Keese assumed to be the worth of a ton of iron in the city of New York, to wit, ninety dollars, the remainder will show the price at which, by their statement, the same quantity of a better description of iron could, by the refining process, be produced from pigs, and yield the same profit to the manufacturer, which is the difference between $52 26 and $90, namely, - - - - - 37 74

The cost of a ton of iron, according to Mr. Keese, in the city of New York, (see page 23, Rep.) - - - - - $90 00

It will be observed, that between this statement, the elements of which have been drawn from the testimony of Messrs. Keese, Mitchell, and Jackson, and that which your memorialists have given, there is a difference of two dollars and twenty-six cents, your memorialists' estimate of the whole cost of a ton of iron made from imported pigs being forty dollars. As the above gentlemen all spoke of the iron business being a losing one, this difference of two dollars and twenty-six cents per ton in their favor would afford them a handsome profit, without including other deductions that could be made from their estimates. But they remarked before the committee, that their hands, team, work, coal, &c. were paid for by them in farm produce and store goods, which, it is well known, are charged at much higher rates than the same articles when obtained elsewhere, and which, moreover, is admitted by these gentlemen, in their evidence given before the committee, when they expressly declared that in this way their "losses" were made up. The difference, then, between the rates at which they dispose of store goods and produce, and the current cash prices of the same articles, unquestionably is a profit, which must be carried to the credit of iron, and not to that of goods and produce, which can never be considered, in any correct statement, as being worth more than the common market price. It may be further said, that, even according to their own views of profit and loss, however erroneous and inadmissible, as their "establishments" furnish a good market, some portion at least of the remuneration should be considered as belonging to the "establishment." The results here deduced, in relation to the manufacture of pig iron into bar, may be applied equally to blooms, scraps, loops, or other iron in a less manufactured state than bar; and the effect of the free importation, not only of pigs, but of blooms, scraps, loops, &c., would be highly beneficial to American industry, as the same articles are now imported in the state of hardware.

Nintly. When your memorialists compare the duties on iron with those on teas, coffee, and salt, which, at the last session of the present Congress, it was deemed expedient to reduce, the former will be found to be much more objectionable than the latter. Iron in the bar is susceptible of having added to its value double its own cost; whilst tea, coffee, and salt, are all imported in the precise state they are ultimately consumed.

In conclusion, your memorialists beg leave to say, that, as the statements in their former petition were not fully comprehended by the committee of the Senate to whom they were referred, and that as they were, and are, anxious to make themselves clearly understood, they must be excused for taking up so much time with details which cannot be practically known but to themselves, and which, they believe, fully warrant the relief for which they now earnestly pray, namely:

First. That all the existing duties on pig iron, scraps, boiler plates, and all other iron in loops, slabs, blooms, or any other state less manufactured than bar iron, be abolished or repealed, and the importation of the same be admitted free of duty.

Secondly. That all bar iron, manufactured by hammering, be admitted subject to the duty of April 27, 1816, on its importation, to wit, at the rate of 45 cents per cwt.

Thirdly. That all descriptions of iron manufactured by rolling, including bar, bolt, rod, sheet, and hoop, of every size and quality, be admitted, subject to a duty not exceeding that now imposed on the importation of hardware, namely, twenty-five per cent.

Fourthly. That wire of iron or steel, of all sizes and numbers, be admitted, subject to the same duty as the manufactures of wire are now on their importation subject to, namely, twenty-five per cent.

Fifthly. That the duty now imposed on railroad iron, when punched in the United States, be remitted, or a drawback of the existing duty be allowed thereon on all sums exceeding fifty dollars.

And, lastly, that the existing duties on steel be abolished, and the importation of the same admitted free of duty.

All, then, that your memorialists ask, is, that the existing laws shall be so modified, that the iron which is now imported in a state of hardware can be imported in a cruder state, and thereby give equal advantages to your memorialists with those now enjoyed by the British in the American market.

REPORT ON THE BLACKSMITHS' PETITION.

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 28, 1831.

Mr. HAYNE, from the select committee to whom was referred "the petition of upwards of three hundred mechanics, citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, employed in the various branches of the manufacture of iron;" and, also, the petition of the "journeymen blacksmiths of the city and county of Philadelphia, employed in manufacturing anchors and chain cables," reported:

That they have examined the subject embraced in these petitions with all the care and attention which its importance demands. Whether the oppressive operation of the present high duties upon iron be considered in reference to the industry of the petitioners, or the burdens imposed upon the great body of the people, the question is one which is entitled to a candid and thorough investigation. Of all the metals, iron contributes most to the wealth, the comfort, and the improvement of society. It enters most largely into the consumption of all ranks and conditions of men. It furnishes the mechanic with his tools, the farmer with the implements of his husbandry, the merchant with the means of fitting out his ship, and the manufacturer with the very instruments of his wealth and prosperity. The forest falls before the axe; and it is to the plough and the hoe, the spade and the harrow, the pickaxe and the crowbar, that the farmer is indebted for the means of bringing his fields into cultivation, and covering the wilderness with "a golden harvest." In all the operations of husbandry, iron is the indispensable assistant of the husbandman; without whose aid, his whole life would be wasted in a vain struggle to overcome the evils and hardships of his condition. He looks to it for traces and chains for his oxen and his ploughs; for tire for his wheels; for shoes and bits for his horses; for locks for his barns, and fastenings for his dwelling and enclosures; for the reaping and the pruning hook, the scythe and the saw, the hatchet and the hammer, the scales and the steelyards; in short, for almost all the instruments of his prosperity and comfort.

Iron is also the very basis of manufactures. Without its omnipotent aid, what would become of our grist mills and our saw mills; our rice machines, our cotton gins, and our sugar mills; our woollen and cotton factories, and even our steam engines? Our streams might run on forever, and water be evaporated into air; but the wheel would stand still, and not a shuttle or a spindle move in obedience to the will of man. The carpenter and the joiner, the millwright and the wheelwright, the smith, the carrier, and the tanner, the paper maker, and the book binder, nay, all who are engaged in the mechanic arts, require iron and steel (to them more precious than gold) for the very tools and implements of their trade. And look at the condition of the shipwright, the merchant, and the navigator. Without the spikes and the nails, the chains and the bolts, supplied by iron, how could your vessels, "either of commerce or of war," be prepared to encounter and overcome the perils of the mighty deep? Without an anchor, what ship could ride securely at her moorings? How could your steamboats, with their vast and complicated machinery, be enabled to stem the currents of your mighty rivers, bringing together, in harmonious intercourse, the distant parts of our extended country, and carrying back the streams of knowledge and improvement into the remotest corners of the Union? To civilize man, in every situation, iron is an article of indispensable necessity. To borrow the words of one of the ablest political economists of the present day—"Look where you will, in whatever direction you turn your eyes, iron meets you as the most convenient and most necessary of all substances that are not used for food, and without which even food itself could not be supplied; and it is found, from universal experience, that every nation exhibits skill, comfort, and power, in proportion as the raw material is produced more abundantly, more cheaply, and more perfectly. That nation which is practically acquainted with the manufacture, properties, and uses of iron, more than any other, is the most civilized, the wisest, the most powerful, and enjoys more of the comforts of human existence than any other, other advantages being equal." Indeed, when we consider all the diversified and important uses to which iron is applied in the various pursuits of life; its almost miraculous influence in enlarging the bounds of science, extending the powers and promoting the happiness of the human race, endowing man with an almost supreme dominion over the elements, and enabling him to compel them to minister to his wants and his comforts, we are almost tempted to believe that it is the mighty instrument, put into our hands by a wise and merciful Providence, to convert the primeval curse into the greatest of blessings.

With this brief view of the importance of the subject, the committee will proceed to the consideration of the case of the petitioners. It appears that, in March, 1828, while the tariff of that year was before Congress, the blacksmiths of Philadelphia presented their petition, setting forth the oppressive and unequal operation of the then existing duties upon iron, and pointing out the injurious effects that would necessarily result from the proposed increase of those duties. They even then complained "that they found themselves completely shut out of our own market by laws which they were told were made for their protection;" that they were "precluded from participating in the supply of the West Indian and South American markets, which they could supply in many articles, if they could obtain iron at a reasonable price;" that "their business was more depressed than most, if not all others;" and, tracing these evils to the abandonment of the principle "that the duty on the raw material should never exceed that on the manufactured article," they earnestly prayed "that the duty on all descriptions of iron manufactured by rolling should be twenty-five per centum ad valorem, the same as the duty on hardware." Regardless, however, of these remonstrances, the tariff of 1828 became a law; and it is certainly worthy of remark, that, while the protection of American industry was the known and avowed object of that law, not a single provision was introduced in favor of the blacksmiths, justly claiming to be considered "as the most useful mechanics in the world;" but, on the contrary, new and still more onerous burdens were imposed upon them, by adding seven dollars a ton to the already exorbitant duty upon bar iron, while the duty on hardware was suffered to remain at twenty-five per centum ad valorem. In the year 1830, the petitioners, having, by the further experience of two years, realized more fully the grievous operation of this system upon their employments, came again to Congress with another humble petition, setting forth the cruel operation of these laws upon their industry; complaining that they had been treated with the most cruel injustice, and as "if they were not members of the same political family;" pointing out the manifest inequality "of a specific duty amounting to from one hundred and forty to two hundred and fifty per cent. on that kind of iron out of which hardware is made, while an ad valorem duty of only twenty-five per cent. was imposed upon the manufactured article"—thus operating against them as a double lever, from the duty on hardware rising and falling with the price of iron, while that on iron was specific and stationary;" and concluding with an earnest prayer "that they might be put on the same footing, in our own markets, with the foreign manufacturer, by a reduction of the duty on the raw material to an equality with that upon the hardware." This petition met the same fate as that which had preceded it. The case of the petitioners was indeed examined by the Committee on Manufactures; and, in a report made to the Senate, it was not denied that the petitioners had just cause for complaint. It was admitted that they were entitled to be put, in our own markets, on the same footing as the foreign manufacturer, and that this could only be done by establishing "a just proportion between the duties upon bar iron and those upon hardware;" yet, because a reduction of the duty on the raw material was the remedy suggested by the petitioners, no attempt was made to afford them relief. Under all these discouragements, the committee cannot but admire the manly spirit which has induced the petitioners once more to come before Congress, with a complete vindication of themselves from all the imputations which have been attempted to be thrown upon them, with a clear and satisfactory statement of their grievances, and a full and conclusive refutation of all the arguments which have heretofore been urged against their claims. Regarding this petition as one of the ablest and most valuable documents which has of late been issued from the American press, the committee would specially invite the attention of the Senate to it, as a complete and satisfactory exposition of the whole merits of the question. Indulging in no speculations, building up no new theories, the petitioners have, as practical men, brought the maxims of sound common sense and the lessons of experience to the elucidation of the case before them, and have deduced conclusions which, in the opinion of the committee, are absolutely irresistible.

It appears from the petition, (which is fully supported by the statement of John Sarchet, one of the petitioners,) that English common iron, the material used almost exclusively in the manufacture of hardware, was selling in England, at the latest advices, at £5 5s. sterling, equal to $23 33 per ton, the duty on which, at $37 per ton, is equal to 159 per cent.; that the price of smaller sizes of the same iron (such as half inch and under) was £6 5s. sterling, equal to $27 75 per ton, the duty on which, at $78 40 per ton, amounts to 282½ per cent. It is of this latter description of iron that hardware is chiefly manufactured; and the petitioners declare themselves unable to conceive what could have "led the framers of the law, by this discrimination, to give such a decided monopoly to the manufacturers of hardware and ironmongery at Sheffield and Birmingham." An answer to the question may probably be found in the suggestion contained in the report of the Committee on Manufactures, that "there are rolling mills which have been in operation for several years in the county of Morris, in the State of New Jersey, and elsewhere, where common bar iron may be converted into bars and bolts of the smaller size, at a small expense." It is stated by the blacksmiths, however, that some of them have actually paid to the American manufacturers 25 dollars a ton for rolling iron of one inch and under into five-eighths of an inch, and from the same sizes into half an inch 30 dollars a ton; while the whole cost of the former to the manufacturer of hardware in Great Britain is only $23 33 per ton, and of the latter $27 77, whereby the British manufacturer is enabled to import the same into the United States, in the form of hardware, (duty included,) at from $28 83 to $35 39 per ton, "the discriminating duty in favor of the British manufacturers being, on all sizes of iron over half an inch, $31 50, and on half-inch $70 77½," the duties on hardware manufactured of the smaller sizes of iron being only one-eleventh of what they are on iron as a raw material, and on hardware made of larger sizes about one-sixth. In illustration of the practical effect of these unequal duties, several cases are stated by the petitioners, and specimens of the various descriptions of hardware, as well as of the material of which they were severally made, have been exhibited to the committee. From these statements it appears that, under the existing rate of duties, a ton of hammers and sledges can be imported, (nay, it appears from the last Treasury report that they have actually been imported,) "for the use of the American manufacturer of those very articles," at a less cost than the bar iron of which they are made. Wheel tire has actually been imported in a finished state for about $47 17, while bar iron, suitable for this purpose, is selling at about 90 dollars a ton, more than double the price of what it costs when imported in a manufactured state. Frying and dripping pans, both in part and in whole manufactured, are now, and ever have been, imported, duties and all other charges included, at a less price than the cost of sheet iron. Tea trays, of large sizes, made of double rolled sheet iron, with one coat of paint or japan, can be imported, duties and all other charges included, at $83 72 a ton, while the iron required for the same purposes is selling at double the price, say 160 to 170 dollars a ton. Wire, No. 18, is imported, which cost (duty included at 10 cents a pound) 389 dollars a ton, while a ton of knitting needles, of the same material, costs (duty included) only $246 37, being $143 63 a ton less than the cost in the United States of the material of which they are made, whereby a protection to that amount is given to the foreign manufacturer of knitting needles. Hammered nails, which now pay the exorbitant duty of five cents per pound, are, nevertheless, almost exclusively imported, on account of the enormous duty on nail rods, whereby a difference in point of cost is created between the English and American raw material for the manufacture of nails, of $1 20 in every 100 pounds. Hoops, for water and other descriptions of casks, can be imported, duties and charges included, at $57 a ton, being $21 40 less than the duty on the raw material of which they are made.

In the petition of the journeymen blacksmiths, it is further stated, "that, previous to the additional duty on bar iron by the act of 1828, and the fall on iron in Great Britain, about the same time, they were enabled to support their families decently and comfortably, with a prospect of giving some education to their children; but the causes above mentioned have nearly driven the produce of their own industry out of the market." The means by which this result has been produced are clearly set forth and explained in their petition, and fully illustrated by Mr. Sarchet in his statement, (to both of which the committee beg leave to refer,) from which it manifestly appears that a ton of chain cables can now be imported into this country at a less cost than the rods out of which they are made, whereby the petitioners, who have been for many years employed in the manufacture of chain cables, have been brought to the very brink of ruin.

From these and many other examples, it appears, that, whether we have reference to bar iron paying a duty of thirty-seven dollars a ton, or sheet and hoop iron, nail rods, and round or square iron of half an inch and under, all paying a duty of seventy-eight dollars and forty cents per ton, or wire paying from six to ten cents per pound, "the result in each particular case will be the same, making it, consequently, always cheaper to import the above descriptions of iron in a manufactured than in a raw state," thus, of course, depriving the American artisans of employment, which result is produced, not from the duty upon hardware being too low, (for these duties average about thirty-five per cent.) but from the exorbitant duty on iron, averaging from one hundred and fifty-nine to two hundred and eighty-two and three-fourths per cent.

The case, when thus plainly stated, carries with it its own best commentary, and renders argument unnecessary. Well might the petitioners inquire how it has happened that a law so oppressive, unequal, and unjust, could have found its way into our statute book, or been suffered to remain there one moment after its true character had been fully exposed. It will be for the country to say whether the true answer has not been given by Mr. Sarchet, when he says, "that, in the duties heretofore imposed on iron, the iron masters have only considered themselves, and have regarded the mechanics no more than if they were nonentities." It would, indeed, seem as if the tariff had been framed by a combination of interests, from whose counsels the hard working, honest, and industrious mechanics had been entirely excluded. It would almost appear that the joint stock companies, the large capitalists, the owners of woollen and cotton factories, ("those lords of the spindle and the loom,") and the wealthy iron masters, (all ably represented in the national councils,) have been looking only to their own interests, while the mechanic and the laboring man have been overlooked and disregarded. It has, no doubt, often happened, that honest and hard working men (unskilled in "the mysterious trade" of enriching themselves at the expense of others) have found themselves pressed down by this system of indirect taxation, though unable to discover the secret springs of that grand machine (miscalled the American system) by which all their efforts are paralyzed—a system artfully contrived "to make the rich richer," while it humbles in the very dust the best hopes of those whose "hard hands and honest hearts" entitle them to the grateful consideration of their country.

Mr. Sarchet tells us that he has been engaged for thirty-five years in the blacksmith's business; that he has travelled extensively, and seen much of the world; but "that he has never seen any blacksmiths so poor, or carrying on a less prosperous business, than those in the United States at this time; which is owing, as he believes, to the high duty which they are compelled to pay on iron."

The committee forbear from making any further remarks on the manifest inequality and injustice of the existing duties, and they do this the more readily, since, whatever difference of opinion may prevail as to the precise extent of the evil complained of, there is and can be none as to its existence, or as to the just claims of the petitioners to redress. The petitioners have insisted that it is absolutely necessary that a "due proportion" should be observed between the duties on the raw material and the manufactured article; and as the Committee on Manufactures, in their report made last year to the Senate, have recognised the correctness of this principle, it only remains to be considered by what means this due proportion can be obtained. The petitioners insist that this can only be accomplished by a reduction of the existing duty on the raw material, while the Committee on Manufactures contend that it can be best effected by a corresponding increase of the duties on hardware. In proceeding to the examination of this question, the committee cannot refrain from the expression of their admiration of the enlightened and liberal views which seem to have governed the petitioners on this occasion. With a magnanimity worthy of all praise, they have scorned to relieve themselves from unjust and unequal burdens, by attempting to throw them upon the shoulders of others, and have firmly and manfully resisted all the temptations held out to them "to ask" that their industry should be protected by the imposition upon others of the same exorbitant duties of which they have so justly complained.*

The committee could not forbear from doing this justice to the wisdom and the virtue which have enabled the petitioners to discern the true policy of the country, and to rise superior to all temptation. In the examination which they have made of this subject, the committee have been forcibly struck with the sound and conclusive reasons which the petitioners have adduced in support of the position, that a low duty on the raw material is the only just and effectual means by which American manufactures can receive a wholesome encouragement; that the "due proportion" which all admit ought to be preserved between the duty on the raw material and that on the manufactured article, can, in this instance, only be attained by a reduction of the duty on the former; and that such a measure, whilst it would duly encourage the American mechanics, and lessen the tax upon consumers, would not be injurious to the owners of the rich and valuable iron mines of the United States; and, so far from diminishing the resources of the country, that such a measure would add greatly to the comforts of the people, and promote their prosperity in peace, and security in war. Nothing can be more obvious than the position assumed by the petitioners, that, to preserve this "due proportion," the same protection must be afforded to their industry that is extended to the iron masters: but as the latter has been shown (according to the statement of the blacksmiths) to be equal to from one hundred and fifty-nine to two hundred and eighty-two per cent., it follows that the duties upon hardware must be augmented to an amount which would not only be manifestly unjust, but altogether impracticable.

* In the report of the Committee on Manufactures, it is stated "that the committee are of opinion that there should be a just proportion between the duties upon bar iron and those upon hardware, but that this proportion can be most properly attained by increasing the duty upon hardware, &c. But this it seems the petitioners do not ask or wish."

The committee believe, with the petitioners, that if such exorbitant duties could be imposed upon hardware, so far from benefiting any class of the community, it would tend to introduce smuggling and evasions of the revenue, and lead extensively to the substitution of hemp, leather, wood, and other cheap materials, for the iron which is now used. It is the interest of every nation to introduce iron as extensively as possible into the consumption of the people, because it is, of all known materials, the strongest, the most durable, and capable of being applied to the greatest variety of uses. All experience has shown that exactly in proportion to the low rate of duty, and consequent cheapness of the raw material, is the general use of this article. In this respect the present condition of England and France furnishes an admirable commentary on the impolicy of the protecting system, when applied to an article of such primary necessity, and which contributes so essentially to the comfort, prosperity, and improvement of the people. It is stated, that, in consequence of the moderate duty and low price of iron in England, the consumption of iron in that country, in comparison with that of France, (where the protecting system has been carried to the utmost extent,) is (in proportion to population) as thirteen to one; and we learn from the most authentic sources, that the consequence is every where to be traced in the more highly improved state of agriculture and the mechanic arts throughout Great Britain, while in France the eye is every where offended by the rude machinery and coarse implements of husbandry which the people are constrained by the impolicy of their laws to use. In England, the low duty has greatly enlarged the consumption of iron, and increased the production of their mines, while in France the high duties have produced directly the contrary results.

Every dictate of justice, and every consideration of sound policy, therefore, combine in bringing the committee to the conclusion that the petitioners are entitled to relief; and they are convinced that this relief can only be afforded by reducing the duty on raw iron, as prayed for in the petition—a measure which, they are satisfied, would be attended with the happiest consequences to the whole community. By reducing the duty on raw iron, this material, and every article of hardware, could be furnished to the consumers at a more moderate price.* By the law as it now stands, every farmer in the country pays a tax equal, it is believed, on an average, to forty dollars on every hundred dollars' worth of iron which he consumes. An abundant supply of cheap iron, while it would give a new impulse to the industry of our mechanics, would supply the wants of all other classes of our fellow-citizens, by furnishing a better article, and at a cheaper rate. The foreign, added to the domestic competition, would bring down the prices of bar iron, as well as of hardware, to the lowest rate at which they could be furnished. Iron would be much more generally used, and every man in the country would be relieved from a portion of the taxes which he now bears. And why, let us ask, should this blessing not be bestowed upon the people? Because it is feared that the profits of the iron masters would be lessened; that, possibly, a few iron mines would be thrown out of use, and the supply of American iron be diminished. That a diminution in the price of iron might cause a few worn out and worthless mines (forced into existence, and sustained by the bounty) to be given up, and might, in some instances, lessen the profits of the iron masters, is not improbable; but that the rich mines of Pennsylvania, or of the Western country, would be abandoned, the committee cannot bring themselves to believe. Most of these mines, it has been shown, are out of the reach of foreign competition.* They were profitably worked before the revolution, and flourished under a protecting duty of only five per cent. The fresh impulse that would be given to the industry of the country, the increase in the consumption of iron, and the consequent enlargement of the demand, would, it is most confidently believed, produce a corresponding increase in the production of our mines; while the great addition to the number, and consequent improvement in the skill, of our artisans and mechanics, would enlarge, in an equal degree, the resources of the country in peace and in war. In every view of the subject, therefore, the committee is satisfied that the relief prayed for by the petitioners, while it is essential to save them from impending ruin, can be afforded not only without injury to others, but with entire safety to the country, and to the great and lasting benefit of the whole community. Under this strong conviction, the committee would not hesitate to report a bill for the relief of the petitioners, but that the few days which now remain of the session must preclude all hope of such a measure being acted on at this time. They content themselves, therefore, with submitting the whole subject to the favorable consideration of Congress, with a distinct expression of the approbation of the committee of the general views of the petitioners, and the hope that the blacksmiths and workers in iron throughout the United States will not be discouraged by their repeated failures to obtain justice; but that

* Mr. Sarchet states, "that, if he could get his iron free of duty, he would contract to furnish cut nails at 3½ cents per pound: they now sell for 5½ cents. He would make wrought nails at an amount less by the duty, that is to say, at 5 cents less than the present price." Similar reductions in price would probably be produced in most descriptions of hardware. Mr. Sarchet estimates that, of "the 47,000 tons of hardware now annually imported, 35,000 tons would be manufactured in this country."

* It appears from the statement of Mr. Sarchet, that while there are one hundred thousand mechanics and workers in iron in the United States, there are probably not more than eleven thousand persons in all, employed in preparing and making bar iron, and that this includes wood choppers, coal burners, &c. &c., and that of this number three-fifths are employed in the country, out of the reach of competition. Mr. Sarchet supposes that not more than three thousand of this number are mechanics; and, to give them employment, one hundred thousand blacksmiths are oppressed, and the addition of fifty thousand to the number prevented.† From an elaborate statement and calculation, contained in the petition, (to which the committee beg leave to refer,) it also appears, that the whole annual consumption of iron in the United States is 116,344 tons; that, of this quantity, 81,344 tons are of foreign, and 35,000 tons of American iron; that of these 35,000 tons, only 17,000 reach the seaboard. From this statement, it also appears, that, of rolled iron, ten-elevenths were imported in the manufactured, and only one-eleventh in the raw state; that the American manufactured bar iron, which comes to the seaboard, compared with the foreign, is in the proportion of one to nine—10,000 tons (according to the report of the Committee on Manufactures, made to the House of Representatives in 1828,) being the whole amount, including every description of iron which is brought from the interior to the seaboard. And it is (say the petitioners) "for the protection of this inconsiderable quantity of American iron," that the duties complained of have been imposed.

† In support of this statement, Mr. Sarchet refers to the testimony of the iron masters, taken before the Committee on Manufactures in the House of Representatives, in 1823.

they will again bring forward their claims before Congress at their next session, in a shape calculated to command the attention of that body, and to ensure the blacksmiths a "happy issue" out of all their difficulties.

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT.

Since the above report was prepared by the committee, a memorial has been referred to them, signed by a large number of "the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, engaged in the manufacture of iron, and of those friendly to the production of it in this country;" and six copies of the same, signed by a number of the citizens of New Jersey, have also been referred to them. This memorial, it appears, has been "got up" in opposition to the foregoing petition of the blacksmiths, the statements and arguments of which it strongly controverts; and the memorialists conclude with "a deprecation of any reduction of the present rate of duties upon iron." The committee have bestowed on these memorials that respectful attention which is due to the representations of every portion of their fellow-citizens. They have examined the ground assumed by the blacksmiths, and, having compared the reasoning urged on both sides of the question, are satisfied that there exist no such errors, either in the facts or arguments relied on by the blacksmiths, as to shake the confidence of the committee in the soundness of their views, or the correctness of their conclusions. Having already occupied so much space in presenting their views of this question, they will now only advert to a few topics introduced into this memorial, which seem to require comment. With regard to the surprise expressed by the memorialists, that, after such "decisive acts of the last session of Congress," in relation to the claims of the blacksmiths, an attempt should be again made, by the same individuals, "to disturb the interests of the iron manufacturers," the committee feel themselves compelled to declare, that, even if Congress had adopted the most decisive acts in reference to these claims, it would furnish no just ground, either of surprise or complaint, that American citizens, believing themselves to be aggrieved, should continue to urge their just claims while any hope of relief shall remain. The "decisive acts" alluded to, however, consisted merely in a report of the Committee on Manufactures, which never received the sanction of either branch of Congress. When it is asserted that the object of the blacksmiths is "to withdraw the protection extended to the manufacturers of iron," to "build up a new fabric on its ruins," and to deprive this country of the only mode by which a supply of cheap iron can be procured, it is manifest that the memorialists have not understood either the true objects of the petitioners, or the means by which it is proposed to attain them. It is impossible to conceive that the petitioners could have any other object in view than that which they have avowed, viz. the securing an abundant supply of cheap iron: for it is by this, and this alone, that they can ever be enabled to enter into successful competition with British workmen "in the manufacture of the various articles of hardware;" and if this be a "new business," it is one that cannot, in the opinion of the committee, be entered upon too soon, or prosecuted too earnestly; and, whatever may be the views of the petitioners, the committee can hardly imagine an object of greater "national importance," than to raise up, by the operation of a system of just and equal laws, which shall leave labor free to seek its own employment, a band of hardy and industrious mechanics and artisans, constituting, as they must, the strength and pride of their country, and who, if they cannot present themselves with "clean hands," will assuredly come with pure and honest hearts. If these men have justly incurred censure in supposing that cheap iron would be more certainly obtained by enlarging the field of competition, the committee can only say that it is a censure which they are perfectly willing to share with the petitioners, and with the great masters of the science of political economy, whose labors have enlightened the world. The notion that "high duties reduce prices," and, at the same time, afford protection to the domestic manufacturer, involves a paradox too gross to be believed by any one not blinded by interest, or laboring under what the committee must consider as a most extraordinary delusion. It is an idea resting, as far as the committee can perceive, on no better foundation than the great reduction in prices which has taken place of late years in all descriptions of manufactures—a reduction influenced by other causes than the operation of a tariff of protection, as is fully proved from the fact that it has extended indiscriminately to every part of the civilized world, and has been produced in at least an equal degree upon articles which have received no protection. How it is possible that the high duty on iron should have reduced the prices, and be calculated to reduce them still further, while it is asserted that "a removal of the duties would be the entire destruction of every iron establishment in the United States," is to the committee utterly incomprehensible. With respect to the sarcasms in which the petitioners have indulged in reference to Mr. Sarchet, who is stigmatized as a "foreigner from the island of Guernsey, laboring under the most violent of all prejudices—an English prejudice," the committee feel themselves, in justice to Mr. Sarchet, bound to declare that they have never, in the whole course of their experience, come across an individual possessed of more practical knowledge of the subject, of clearer or more liberal views, freer from prejudice of any description, or more entitled to implicit confidence. Though a native of the island of Guernsey, he has resided for near thirty years in the United States, during the whole of which period he has been distinguished for his industry, intelligence, and probity.

But, whatever may be the demerits of Mr. Sarchet, it will not be pretended that the three hundred American mechanics, who, by joining in the petition, have given their sanction to its contents, are not as much entitled to respect and confidence as the memorialists themselves; nor can the country fail to see the very different ground on which the parties to this controversy stand; the one claiming for their industry nothing but freedom from restraint, and the other asking for protection; the former seeking only relief from oppression, and the latter insisting on securing to themselves the fruits of that oppression. There is a wide difference, too, in the reliance to be placed in their respective statements, (without intending to impeach the character of any of the parties.) The blacksmiths, in pointing out the inequality of the existing duties upon raw and manufactured iron, speak from their own personal experience, and a thorough practical knowledge of the subject, while the memorialists have candidly acknowledged "that they are not sufficiently conversant with the details of the subject to judge whether or not there exists a just proportion between the duties upon bar iron and those upon hardware."

The allusions to "English prejudices," &c. &c. which run through the memorial, cannot be misunderstood. They are the appeals too often and too successfully made to that very prejudice which the memorialists affect to condemn. "American industry" is the delusive phrase artfully employed by those who choose to consider their own industry as exclusively American, and who attempt to conceal, under the mask of patriotism, an exclusive devotion to their own peculiar interests. The true American system, in the estimation of the committee, consists in free trade and unrestricted industry; and they cannot bring themselves for one moment to believe that the capital and industry employed in the fabrication of cotton and woollen cloths, or in digging iron ore from the mines, are more strictly American than that employed in raising cotton or wool, in building ships, carrying on commerce, or even converting iron into hardware. Nor can they bring themselves to believe that either of these interests is more entitled to protection than the others, or that any of them can have the smallest claim upon the country, except that their labor and capital should be left free to seek their own employment, and to secure their own reward, without being burdened with unnecessary taxes.

The complaint made against the repeated applications to Congress to reduce the duties, "as one of the devices employed to impede the progress and extension of the manufacture of iron in this country," is so manifestly unfounded and unjust, that the committee are only induced to notice it as a manifestation of "the temper and spirit" which animate the petitioners on this occasion. It is altogether inconceivable that the mechanics and workers in iron could have the least desire, much less "employ devices" of any kind, to prevent the production of cheap iron in this country, since their own interest, as well as the welfare of their country, is alike to be promoted by obtaining the largest supplies of this material, and at the cheapest rates. It may be true that these repeated applications "create alarm in those already concerned in the iron mines;" and it would no doubt be extensively gratifying to them to be allowed to consider "the faith of the Government" as so far "pledged" to this system of protection as not to suffer its stability ever to be questioned. But the petitioners may be assured, that, so long as this system is felt by a large and respectable portion of their fellow-citizens as a burden unjustly imposed upon them for the benefit of the manufacturers of iron, so long will the applications for its modification continue to be urged with untiring energy and zeal. It may be worthy of their consideration, therefore, whether it would not be to their advantage to obtain that "security and permanence" for their establishments, which they consider as "essential to their success," by consenting, at once, to such a reasonable reduction of the duty as would remove all just grounds for future complaint; and it may be also worthy of their consideration, as patriotic citizens, whether they ought not even to make some sacrifices to that spirit of discontent which so extensively prevails throughout the United States in reference to this system. The appeal which the memorialists have made, in order to enlist other interests in their cause, by suggesting that the mechanics' petition "has been got up for the purpose of destroying the whole system of a protecting policy, and that it lays the axe to the root of the entire system," contains a clear development of the plan by which this system is maintained, which all admit to be extremely imperfect, and, in many of its parts, grossly oppressive and unjust. It is a system maintained by a combination, founded on the mutual support of what is called an "entire system," but which is in fact a mere collection of exorbitant duties, indiscriminately imposed on raw materials and manufactured articles, without any method or system whatever—a combination which resists all modification or improvement, which seeks to shut out inquiry, and would ever stifle complaint. As the memorialists have quoted the opinion of the President of the United States on one branch of this subject, we will quote, for their instruction, his opinion on the very point now under consideration. In his opening message to Congress, the President specially warns us against that desire "to sustain a general system," by "purchasing the support of different interests;" and strongly denounces "those acts of majorities, founded not on an identity of conviction, but in a combination of small minorities, entered into for the purpose of mutual assistance in measures which, resting only on their own merits, could never be carried." The committee are inspired with fresh confidence in the correctness of the views they have taken on this subject, from the fact that the memorialists have not attempted to contradict any of the material facts stated by the blacksmiths, and that, with regard to such as they have contradicted, they have not succeeded in maintaining their positions. Take, for example, their estimate of the quantity of iron now annually produced in the United States. By a conjectural estimate, founded on no satisfactory data, they have assumed that 120,000 tons of iron are now annually produced in this country; but when the Committee on Manufactures of the House of Representatives made a "personal examination" of this subject in 1828, calling before them experienced iron masters, they could not obtain information of more than 30,000 tons; and Mr. Sarchet informs us that a gentleman, who not long since travelled through the United States, for the express purpose of ascertaining the truth on the subject, estimated the whole production at only 35,000 tons; and yet the memorialists have not hesitated to put down at a venture the quantity of iron made in the United States at 120,000 tons. The committee will not pretend to decide the question, but certainly the weight of authority is against the memorialists. The committee are sensible that they have already consumed too much time on this subject, and they will therefore conclude with the expression of a decided opinion that the iron masters, and others concerned in these petitions, have presented no new facts, and urged no arguments, that shake the positions assumed by the blacksmiths, or which go to show that a reduction of the duty on raw iron ought not to take place.

John Sarchet's statement, January 31, 1831.

At a meeting of the select committee of the Senate, to whom was referred the petition of certain citizens of Philadelphia, "mechanics employed in various branches of the manufacture of iron," praying for a reduction of the duty on the raw material used in the various branches of their manufacture, John Sarchet, one of the petitioners, was called before the committee, and, on his examination, said: That he is a chain and anchor manufacturer, and generally engaged in the ship-smithing business, in Philadelphia, where he has carried on that business for the last six years. He has been for thirty-five years engaged in the blacksmith's business; has resided in Pennsylvania for the last fourteen years, and is well acquainted with the course of the iron business there. The effect of the additional duty of $7 a ton, imposed by the tariff of 1828 on rolled iron, was most severely felt by the workers in iron. It amounted to an addition of twenty per cent. on some qualities of iron in which they worked: he alludes to English common iron. [The witness here produced specimens of several descriptions of iron manufactures, and also of the raw material of which they were made. The first consisted of two iron bars, the one punched for railroads, and the other plain, of the like quality; the next a chain, and a piece of the iron rod out of which it was made.] The witness then stated that the duty on the bar, thus prepared for railroads, was, when laid, twenty-five per centum ad valorem; the cost of such iron in England, at the cash cargo price, was £5 5s.; and £5 10s. at six months. In Wales, Staffordshire iron was worth 10s. a ton more. The expense of punching it was about 25s. a ton; equal, at the usual rate of exchange, to $5 50. The fair average price in this country, therefore, of this punched iron, would be about $50 a ton; while the cost of the plain bars, out of which it was made, would be about $70 a ton. The first cost being £5 5s., and the duty $37 a ton, it followed, therefore, that railroad iron could be imported at $20 a ton cheaper than the bar iron out of which it is made; and it is, therefore, impossible to prepare railroad iron in this country now.

Since the year 1828, there has been a fall in the price of iron in England, from £8 to £5 10s. a ton, which has operated to increase the duty, in consequence of its being a specific duty. Hammered iron is made in England, and some of it is imported into this country. Reeves and Whitaker, and Mark Richards, of Pennsylvania, have imported it. It costs, duty included, about $78 a ton. Believes it to be a mistake to suppose that the quality of iron depends on the process of hammering or rolling, by which it is prepared; thinks it depends chiefly on the purification by fire; the oftener it is heated, and the harder it is pressed, the better it will be.

Before the witness came to Philadelphia, he followed his business in Ohio. He came to the United States in 1806, and went to Ohio in 1807, where he remained ten years. He is a native of the island of Guernsey, where he followed his business until he came to this country. The witness knows of no railroad iron having been used for other purposes than railroads, either before or after the passage of the law granting a drawback. In relation to the chain and rod, before alluded to by the witness, he said that a ton of the chain could be imported into this country at \$40 65 cheaper than the rods out of which it is manufactured, allowing the same for manufacturing in each country; the duty on the former being $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb., (equal to \$78 40 a ton,) and on the latter 25 per cent. ad valorem. There is a difference, however, in rating such chains as this, in New York and in Philadelphia: in New York, it is rated as a chain, which pays a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem; while, in Philadelphia, it is called a chain cable, and is charged at three cents a pound. There is no doubt, however, that it ought to be charged as a chain, and not as a cable, since it is too small to be used as a cable for any but oyster boats, while its proper and general use is for topsail sheets and ties, for hoisting goods up, &c. &c. This is a half-inch chain, and made of English common iron: the price of the rods in England is about 26 5s. per ton, cash, cargo price. There is a loss of from 12 to 20 per cent. in manufacturing rods into chains; 12 per cent. may be taken as the average loss in manufacturing iron: this, of course, increases the duty on the raw material in proportion to that on the manufactured article.

The average price of such iron, imported in large bars, up to two inches, would be from $73 to $75. The witness here produced a bolt, which, he said, was imported in bars: it cost $78. He had made it into rods in this country, and it cost the witness $105; if made in England, would not have cost more than $85. Thinks the expense of converting bars into rods in this country would be about $20 a ton: he has paid $25 for five-eighths, and $30 for half-inch. It is much cheaper to make the bolts or bars originally, than to roll it into bolts or bars afterwards, as this would require a second heating. It would just make the difference between an expense of $4 44 and $20. The witness here produced a shovel, finished, with the exception of the handle, and stated that the duty on this article, and also on frying-pans, and other articles made of sheet iron, is 25 per centum ad valorem; and that a ton of such articles can be imported into this country at $34 62 less than the materials of which they are made; so that it is, of course, impossible to make such articles in this country. If the duty on iron were reduced, he thinks that the duty on chains could also be reduced in a short time, without injury to the chain makers. If it were raised, as suggested by one of the committee, [Mr. DICKINSON,] the only effect would be to drive chain cables out of use in this country, and to introduce cordage as a substitute. He knows that the present high duty has already produced that effect, to some extent. The ship owners would be driven, too, to supply their ships with chain cables abroad, in the place of hemp cables carried out from this country, which would be cut up for junk; and where the duty had been paid on a chain cable, another would be procured in England, and the old one be turned over to another ship. Believes this has already been done in some cases, in consequence of the high duty. The duty of three cents a pound on chain cables can afford no protection to the American blacksmith, while the duty on the raw material is as high as it now is. Their industry can only be protected by bringing down the duty on the iron, so as to enable them to procure the material in which they work at as cheap a rate as the manufacturers of other countries. This would also encourage the consumption of iron, and increase the demand for their labor. The witness here stated, that, though American iron was well fitted for several uses, as stated in the blacksmiths' petition, yet it was not adapted to the manufacture of chain cables; in proof of which, he produced a chain cable, one part of which was made of English, and the other of American iron: the former had been in use for six years, and the latter for only three; and yet, as might be seen on examination, while the English part of the chain was still good, the American had been nearly corroded through with rust. This difference was beginning to be so well understood in this country, that American captains, who were aware of it, would hardly take a cable made of American iron. An experienced whaler lately told him he would not take a chain cable made of American iron as a gift. The witness here exhibited a horse-shoe imported from England, a ton of which would cost just about the same thing in this country as the iron out of which they are made. He exhibited, also, some English iron bed-screws. It is impossible now to make such in this country. If witness should buy the iron to make a gross of such screws, and were to throw in his labor and fuel for nothing, he would be glad to pay upwards of one dollar out of his own pocket to have them taken off his hands. The witness next exhibited a bundle of English knitting needles, and confirmed all the facts stated in the blacksmiths' petition in relation to them. The witness then, referring to the petition, said he had carefully examined all the facts and arguments therein contained, as well as those contained in the former petitions on the same subject, and that he now confirmed all the statements contained in them, with the single exception of the variations which may have taken place in prices since they were drawn. After an investigation of the whole subject, and a careful examination of the present condition of the iron trade in this country, and especially of all classes of persons concerned in the production and manufacture of iron, it is his decided opinion, that, if rolled and hammered iron were admitted into the United States at a moderate duty, or duty free, it would be greatly for the advantage of all the parties concerned. In support of this opinion, the witness again referred to the reasoning contained in the petition, of which he entirely approved. He stated, also, among other things, that he had no doubt that a low duty on the raw material would so much increase the consumption of iron in this country, as to compensate the owners of mines, by the increased demand, for any diminution which might take place in the price; that, though old, worn out, and worthless mines, which may be now worked, in consequence of the high duty, might be abandoned, the rich mines of Pennsylvania and elsewhere could be worked with increased activity and profit. Witness said he knew that a good mine could be worked profitably in America without protection, from the fact that mines were worked at Trois Rivieres, in Canada, where the duty on foreign iron was only five per cent. The witness further stated, that, from a calculation founded on the Treasury reports, it appears that 47,000 tons of hardware were now annually imported into this country; and he had no doubt that, if the raw material was cheaper, 35,000 tons out of these 47,000 would be manufactured in this country, which would greatly increase the number of workers in iron, and give a new impulse to the industry of the country. In answer to a question submitted by one of the committee, [Mr. DICKINSON,] whether an additional duty of one cent per pound on all manufactures of iron would not remedy the evils of which the blacksmiths complained in their petition, the witness said that it unquestionably would not; that the only effect of such a duty would be to lessen the consumption of iron, and, indeed, to drive it out of use, wherever hemp, or wood, or any other substitute could be found for it. The witness here stated that he considered the existing laws of the United States, in relation to iron, imposing, as they do, a duty of from 159 to 280 per cent. on the raw material, and 25 per cent. on the manufactured article, to be exactly of the same character as if Great Britain should impose a duty of from 150 to 280 per cent. on raw cotton, and 25 per cent. on cotton manufactures. Great Britain encouraged her manufactures, by admitting the raw material at a low duty, or duty free; and, to encourage our mechanics, we should do the same.

The witness believes that ninety-nine hundredths of the hardware imported into this country is made of English common iron, such as he exhibited a specimen of in a rod twisted, when cold, by himself, into a knot, which he considers as establishing its good quality. Such iron cost in Wales £5 5s. cash, cargo price. It is stated in the Treasury report that 3,000 tons of this iron are annually imported into this country. The witness here presented a specimen of hoop iron, punched, and said that the whole cost of this article, duty included, would be about $37 a ton, but the duty alone and the raw material would be $78 40; the whole cost would be from $120 to $125. Understands, however, that the Treasury Department has decided that, to constitute this article manufactured iron, the hoops must be riveted; he thinks this must be wrong: for if the increased labor of the foreign workman is to have the effect of lessening the duty, this would be tantamount to the prohibition of any American labor being bestowed on such articles, which must certainly be contrary to the intent of the law. The witness proceeded to give another reason why an increase of the present duty on manufactured iron could not answer the purpose of the blacksmiths, that nothing short of a due proportion between the duty on the raw material and the manufactured article would answer any purpose; and as the duty on the raw material was now from 159 to 280 per cent., an equivalent duty could not possibly be imposed on hardware; and if it were, the articles so taxed could not be generally used. The present duty on rolled iron was $37 a ton. To impose an equivalent duty on the manufactured article, so as to put the blacksmiths on a footing with the iron masters, would require three times that amount, say $111, or 159 per cent. These duties, however, never can be equalized, while one is an ad valorem and the other a specific duty; both ought to be an ad valorem duty—a low duty, and that of equal amount.

To show the effect of high and low duties on the consumption of iron, and on the number and skill of the workmen employed in the manufacture, the witness referred to a French work, entitled An Inquiry into the Mines, reviewed in the London Foreign Quarterly Review for October, 1830. He there finds that the quantity of iron annually consumed in France is 175,000 tons. In England, the consumption of cast iron alone is 700,000 tons; the average consumption in proportion to population is as 13 to 1; and in the same ratio will be found the skill of the mechanics. The witness has seen a lady in France holding up the foot of a horse, while the blacksmith (if he could be so called) was hammering on the shoe. Witness attributes both the small quantity of iron consumed in France, and the want of skill in the manufacture, to the high duty on the raw material, which is three or four times as high in France as in England. Thinks, if the duty on iron were reduced in this country, the consumption of chain cables would be doubled. In France, wood is one of the great substitutes for iron. Hemp is another. Leather is also much used, and stone, (as for bridges.) French ships use hemp cables, while English ships not only use chain cables, but use iron all over the rigging, to an extent unknown in American vessels. Witness believes there has been some improvement in the rolling mills in this country of late years. These mills are not generally owned by the iron masters. These mills would be worked more profitably, if the raw iron could be bought cheaper. The witness thinks, that, on the whole, as much money is paid for the manufacture of iron in England as in this country. He made a calculation on chains, in Liverpool, six years ago, and found that witness paid here one dollar for work, which cost there seventy-five cents. In puddling iron, 8s. a ton is the present price in England. Iron is generally made into bars by two distinct classes of persons. In some parts of England, a vein of iron ore, four inches thick, will be worked for several hundred feet; it yields from 27½ to 33½ per cent. His information on this point is derived from books. If the duty on iron was reduced as prayed for by the blacksmiths in their petition, the American workers in iron would enter into competition with the foreign manufacturers, and he has no doubt that employment would be given to 50,000 mechanics beyond those now employed in the United States; and this in addition to the multitude of persons who would be employed by or through them, such as coal diggers, laborers, farmers, &c. &c. Thinks cut and hammered nails would then be furnished cheaper than at present. If witness could get his iron free of duty, he would contract to furnish cut nails at 3½ cents per lb.; they now sell for 5½. He could make wrought nails at an amount less by the duty, that is to say, at five cents less than the present price. He made lately for a railroad half a ton of such nails at 11 cents; they were made mostly of Juniata iron, and could have been furnished at $4 20 per cwt. less, but for the duty on iron. These nails would have been imported, if they could have been got from England in time. In all Philadelphia, he knows of but two hands now employed in making wrought nails. The witness is confident if iron was admitted at a low duty, or duty free, there would be a more abundant supply of the article, both in peace and in war, and the capacity of the country to furnish articles of iron of every description, from cannon down to nails, would be greatly increased. If there are now a hundred thousand persons, as he believes, employed in the blacksmith's business in this country, there could be added at least 50,000 to the number; there would be an increased demand for iron of every description; the good American mines would yield much larger quantities; and most of the hardware now made in England would be manufactured in this country. There is a much larger number of persons interested in the manufacture of iron than in working the mines. From the testimony of the iron masters before the Committee on Manufactures of the House of Representatives, in 1828, (see report No. 115, p. 37,) it appears that but eleven thousand persons in all were employed in preparing and making bar iron; and this includes wood choppers, coal burners, &c. &c., and of this number three-fifths are employed in the country, entirely out of the reach of competition. But, of this number, not more than 3,000 are mechanics; and to give these people a bounty, 100,000 blacksmiths are oppressed, and the addition of 50,000 to their number prevented, which would add immensely to the power and resources of the country, in peace and in war. The witness says he has travelled extensively, and seen much of the world, but he has never seen any blacksmiths so poor, or carrying on a less prosperous business, than those of the United States at this time, which is owing, as he confidently believes, to the high duty which they are compelled to pay on iron, which not only increases the price of the raw material in which they work, but lessens the demand for their labor. When in the island of Guernsey, the witness, by the labor of his two hands, realized £500 sterling by the time he was 22 years of age. Thinks this could not now be done in the United States. Witness knows of an Englishman, whose name he thinks was Wood, who came to this country last spring, for the purpose, as he understood, of establishing a manufacture of iron; but, after examining the state of things, he went back, having found, that, under the present high duty on the raw material, Great Britain was the place for making iron, and manufacturing hardware for the United States. That gentleman had travelled through the country, and estimated the quantity of iron made in the United States at 35,000 tons.

The witness has understood that Mark Richards has lately imported a quantity of hoop iron with holes, the duty on which as iron, "in part manufactured," would be one thousand dollars less than the iron of which the hoops are made. Mr. Richards has declared, that, rather than pay the duty on hoops as raw iron, he will re-export them. It would be a bounty to foreign labor if the duty should be reduced according to the quantity of labor bestowed upon the article. Hoop iron has generally been imported in a raw state. In the duties which have heretofore been imposed on iron, the iron masters have only considered themselves, and have regarded the mechanics no more than if they were nonentities. Boiler iron is made principally in Wales, Staffordshire, and Scotland. Witness has formerly imported many tons of stovepipes, by which he saved sixty dollars a ton. He considers the law clear; and, if a higher duty had been imposed, he would have resisted it. Has not imported any stovepipes for the last ten years. The witness here explained why boiler plates ought to be imported duty free, or at a very low duty. Boiler plates are now generally made of American iron, which he thinks render them weaker than the English boiler plates, in consequence of the former being more shelly, or liable to scale off. When boiler plates are imported from England, in consequence of the high duty of seventy-eight dollars a ton, thinner plates are imported than are used for similar purposes in England. The consequence in either case is a greater liability to explosion in steamboats and steam engines, to the great loss of property and of life, and the diminution of safety and comfort in travelling. Since 1817, there has not been a single instance of the bursting of a steamboat in England, and not one on the St. Lawrence, while in this country, since the opening of navigation in the year 1830, there have been no less than fifteen or sixteen. If steam engines could be procured cheaper in this country, their number would be greatly increased, and they would be applied to a variety of uses from which they are now excluded in various branches of manufactures, and especially of iron. Witness would himself have had one in the establishment under his care, if the duty had been less, and many others in Philadelphia would have done the same. The witness, and those who are acting with him, come here, not to ask a favor, but sheer justice; and, while looking to their own interests, they are equally mindful of the interests of the whole country.

ROBERT CLARKE.

NOTE by Mr. SARCHET.

I find by the books of James Drinker, of Philadelphia, that he exported iron to England in the years 1771, '2, and '3; that bar iron is charged in the said books at twenty shillings per cwt., Pennsylvania currency, or $2 66 2-3 cents, equal to $53 33 1-3 cents per ton; that the same iron sold at £15 10s. sterling per ton in Bristol, England; that pig iron is invoiced at $22 and $22 66 2-3 cents per ton; that best common flour sold, according to said books, at $2 35 3/4 cents per cwt.; superfine at $3 13 1/4 cents per cwt.; that wheat sold at one dollar per bushel by the quantity;

Indian corn at fifty-one and fifty-two cents per bushel; from which I conclude that labor rated at about the same as at this time. An extract from the said books is now handed to the chairman of the select committee of the Senate.

INCREASE OF PAY OF CAPTAINS IN THE NAVY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred so much of the President's message as relates to the navy, made the following report, (on so much thereof as recommends an increase of the navy pay:)

That, in the infancy of the Government, when the national treasury was oppressed with a heavy debt, and the resources of our country for the purposes of national revenue had not been fully developed, statesmen of unquestionable patriotism, and eminent political sagacity, resisted the policy of creating a permanent national navy, under a belief that the expenses thereof would be too oppressive on the people, and who also feared that our vessels of war could not contend, with any expectation of conquest, with the old navies of Europe, and predicted, that, whenever they should put to sea in time of war, they were destined to flatter the pride, and to increase the fleets, of our enemies.

The depredations committed on our commerce, and the wrongs inflicted on our seamen, by the corsairs of Algiers, at length induced Congress, in 1794, to provide for the building of a few vessels of war.

To raise the funds necessary for this purpose, an additional duty was laid on the importation of certain enumerated articles, and a loan was authorized, reimbursable from the proceeds of these duties. In 1797 and 1798, the cruisers of France entered within our jurisdictional limits, captured the vessels of her enemy, and committed spoiliations on our commerce.

To repress these lawless acts of aggression, Congress provided for a further increase of our navy. The pressure on the national revenue had not then been lessened, neither had those doubts and fears as to the policy of creating a permanent navy subsided. These acts did not look to such an establishment. They owed their origin to the immediate necessities of the nation for maritime defence, and were to be inoperative if peace should be restored.

This indisposition towards a permanent navy, the temporary character of the service, and the necessity for the immediate addition to the public burdens which this increase of our naval armament imposed, must have induced Congress to have graduated the navy pay as low as practicable consistently with the public service. No certain and regular addition has since been made to it. The brilliant achievements of the navy during the late war produced a revolution in the public opinion in its favor. The nation became convinced of the expediency of fostering its growth, and that the pay of its gallant officers was too small; and Congress, by the act of 1815, vested in the President a discretionary power of enlarging it twenty-five per cent., whenever the nature of the service in which the navy should be employed, should, in his judgment, require it.

At the close of the late war the public debt had been much increased. An anxiety for its prompt reduction pervaded the community.

A system of general retrenchment was adopted by Congress, and the discretionary power vested in the President by the act of 1815 was withdrawn by the act of February, 1817.

The committee submit, herewith, a tabular statement, showing the navy pay from 1794 until the present time.

Congress, after many appeals to its munificence and justice, expressed its conviction that the pay of lieutenants and surgeons in the navy was inadequate, and, by the acts of 1818 and 1828, increased theirs.

The committee have presented this historical account of the rise, progress, and present state of the navy pay, to aid Congress in its deliberations on the question now presented. Do justice and sound policy require an increase of the pay of captains and masters commandant?

The late and present Chief Magistrate (notwithstanding his solicitude to prevent any diversion of the revenue from the early extinguishment of the national debt) have, in their annual communications, earnestly recommended to Congress to increase the navy pay.

The committee mean not to advocate the degrading doctrine, that the recommendations of the Chief Magistrate ought, without inquiry, to be adopted; but it must be conceded that his opinion, communicated to Congress on his high responsibility, as to the expediency of measures within his own immediate and personal knowledge and observation, is entitled to very high consideration.

His military life eminently qualifies him to judge as to the expenses necessarily incurred by officers in either branch of the public defence.

Distributive justice requires that the pay and emoluments of officers of equal grade, rendering like services, discharging like duties, and exposed to like dangers, should approximate. A legislation which neglects this great fundamental principle of national justice, engenders repinings, dissatisfaction, and jealousies. It cannot but be regretted that the laws of Congress furnish, in relation to the army and navy, most glaring departures from this harmonizing principle. The relative rank of the officers of the army and navy is graduated thus:

A captain under five years, whose pay is one thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars, ranks with a lieutenant colonel, who receives two thousand three hundred and seventy-two dollars and thirty-two cents.

A captain over five years, and under ten, ranks with a colonel, who receives two thousand nine hundred and forty-one dollars and thirty-two cents.

A captain over ten years, and under fifteen, ranks with a brigadier general, who receives four thousand four hundred and twenty-two dollars and forty-nine cents.

A captain over fifteen years ranks with a major general, who receives six thousand five hundred and twelve dollars and sixty-four cents.

A master commandant, whose pay is one thousand one hundred and seventy-six dollars, ranks with a major, who receives two thousand one hundred and six dollars and thirty-two cents.

The land officer is selected in his youth, placed under the control of professors eminent for their moral worth and scientific attainments, and paid by the Government. After remaining four years in this state of pupillage and probation, he is called into the army, and in a very short time appointed to services, carrying with them pay and emoluments greater than those of a sea officer who may have spent twenty years in the service.

No system of instruction at the public expense has been adopted for the navy service.

The midshipman may devote any portion of his time which can be spared from his naval duties, to obtain instruction in the line of his profession, and at his own expense.

This is not the only inequality. The various grades of rank in the army give room for promotion. It is not so with the naval service. The captain of to-day, notwithstanding he may remain in the public service during a long life, must die a captain, as Congress has not yet deemed it expedient to establish a higher rank in the naval service.

But the inequality does not stop here; the army officer is rewarded for ten years of meritorious services with a brevet rank, conferring honor, and bringing with it an increase of pay.

The officer of the navy receives from his country no such flattering mark of distinction, although he may have, from the vigor of youth to the decrepitude of old age, spent his life without intermission in the exercise of his profession, with honor to himself, and with profit and glory to his country, as there is no brevet rank established for the navy.

The committee have deemed it proper to collect information from official sources, as to the relative number of promotions which have taken place in the army and navy since 1816, and also the number of brevet rank which has been granted from that period.

While Congress has thus made such honorable and provident provision for the gallant officers of the army, those of the navy (who have, with such consummate valor, admirable skill, and noble daring, sustained the honor of our infant flag against every foe, and who, at the proudest period of the naval glory of England, dispelled, by successive victories, that confidence in her naval invincibility, which a series of brilliant and exterminating triumphs over the combined navies of Europe had produced,) have experienced from Congress a mortifying indifference to every appeal and commendation made to it, to approximate their pay to that of the army.

Is there any thing in the character of the two services which vindicates this disparity in emoluments and honor, and this indifference to the claims of the navy officers? Does the army service require a higher order of intellect, or greater professional attainments? Is it more exposed to danger, or attended with greater deprivations? Does it impose higher responsibilities? or have the present army incumbents a greater claim on the justice, gratitude, and munificence of their country, than those of the navy?

The committee have deemed it expedient to procure a list of the deaths in the navy since 1816. It presents a picture of mortality at which (when contrasted with the number of those employed) the naval officer looks with the most fearful and agonizing forebodings, whenever he is ordered to cruise under a tropical sun, more fraught with danger to human life than even the carnage of battle; a risk from which the army officer is exempted, as he is most generally employed at salubrious stations. Great as the disparity between these two branches of our national defence is thus demonstrated to be, that between the civil list and navy is still more glaring.

The committee exhibit herewith a statement of the progressive and present pay of the civil list, from which it appears that the clerk who transcribes the executive orders to the naval officer, and who gives not to his official duties more than six hours in the day, enjoying all the comforts of domestic life, receives from his Government a higher pay than the naval officer, who, leaving his home, and while guarding with parental solicitude the lives of his crew, exposes his own in every climate; protecting our commerce, vindicating our honor, regulating, upon a high and fearful responsibility, our intercourse with foreign nations, and exposing himself in battle whenever his country calls.

This inequality in our legislation does not stop even here. The present navy pay was graduated in 1799. The pay of all the officers of the Government on the civil list established before them, has been increased.

Either the enhanced price of the necessities of life, the changed condition of society, or the increased resources of the Government, giving rise to more liberal notions as to the value of official services, must have conducted to this increase of compensation.

The navy officers have a right to expect, upon every principle of justice, that the same causes should be productive of the like results in relation to them.

The original sphere of action of no branch of the public service has been so enlarged as that of the navy. The pay was fixed at a period when the operations of the navy were limited principally to the duty of convoy. Its most enthusiastic friends, then, never anticipated that our naval flag would visit every part of the habitable globe, waving over ships of war which would attract attention, excite admiration, and be adopted as models for imitation by the principal maritime Powers of Europe.

This event, so flattering to our national pride, has been realized. This attractive condition of our navy, and its expanded intercourse, impose upon its officers the most distressing and pecuniary expenditures.

Our national character, and the obligations of society, constrain them to reciprocate the courtesies which are extended to them, and which they could not decline without incurring the imputations of mercenary motives.

The naval officer, when afloat, requires two separate establishments. His family must be housed, clothed, and fed, and his children educated. His own table must be supplied from foreign markets, and at the most exorbitant prices. The efficiency and harmony of the service require that he should extend to the officers of the ship, and of the squadron, the hospitality of his table. It appears to the committee, that every observer of domestic expenditure, of the present state of society, and of our naval character and operations, must be convinced that the navy pay is not sufficient for these double establishments. So oppressive have they been, that, in the general, there has been no saving of money among our naval officers. There are very few of them who are not constrained, when they go to sea, to leave with their families allotment tickets of their monthly pay. Naval officers, of admitted prudence and economy, have returned from a long cruise without saving a dollar of their pay. While the simplicity of our republican institutions requires that there shall be no prodigal expenditure of public money to gratify the vanity of official stations, a just and provident policy requires that those who devote themselves to the public service, and their lives to danger for the public good, should receive from the public treasury the means of supporting their families, and those expenses which the stations to which they are called imperiously impose, and from which they cannot shrink without degradation of national and individual character.

The committee have procured a statement of the navy pay of some of the European nations; and it is submitted, so that Congress may contrast theirs with ours.

Immediately after the late European war, in a time of profound peace, and when their national debt was the most oppressive, the people of England loudly murmured against the disparity of pay between their land and naval forces, and remonstrated against the lowness of the navy pay. These murmurings and remonstrances were not disregarded. An order of council, in 1817, passed, approximating the navy pay to that of the army, and was received with general satisfaction.

The committee verily believe that a similar approximation of pay would be received by the American people, in this moment of national wealth, with high approbation. A high-minded and magnanimous people are always pleased at seeing the vindicators of their rights receiving from their Government adequate remuneration.

Great Britain graduates her pay according to the ratings of her ships.

This is in consonance with the frame of her Government, which recognises the necessity of sustaining the Executive Department by an increase of its patronage. Such a scale of graduation ought not, therefore, to be incorporated into the naval code of this country, because of that very tendency to enlarge the sphere of Executive patronage.

The experience of the last war has produced a universal opinion, that, in all future wars with European Powers, our national honor is to be sustained, that our rights are to be vindicated, and our homes are to be protected, by a navy. Under this conviction, millions of the public money have been expended in providing for the permanent increase of the navy.

At the present time, when Europe is convulsed by revolution, portending an appeal to arms, and which may eventually drive us from our pacific relations, it is all-important that a fair compensation should tranquillize the mind of the navy officer, reconcile him to the service, and render it desirable to others.

Under the influence of the preceding considerations, the committee are of opinion that a just and enlightened policy requires that the pay of the captains and masters commandant should be increased.

The committee have forbore to interfere with that of lieutenants and surgeons, inasmuch as they have no reason to believe that any recent circumstances require any legislation in relation to their pay.

The committee find, that, from the first organization of the navy, a practice has prevailed in the Navy Department of allowing to the navy officers emoluments contingent on services performed by them, supposed to be not strictly within the range of their naval duties.

From the nature of the service, it was impracticable to foresee and to provide by legislation for all the duties which the officer might be called on to perform.

Much, therefore, was left for Executive discretion.

These contingent emoluments have been productive of much embarrassment in their adjustment to the head of the department, and of much jealousy and discontent among the officers; and, as experience has now pointed out the general character of these duties, the spirit of the Government requires that official discretion should be circumscribed by legislative provision.

The Government has quarters for the commandant at all of our navy stations except Baltimore. The committee have, therefore, made provision for one at that place. The cabin furniture, except fixtures, for our ships of war, has heretofore been furnished by the commander, and an allowance has been made to him, graduated according to the class of the ship. The committee think it advisable to let the Government exclusively furnish the cabin.

The committee have, in accordance with these views, reported a bill providing for the increase of the pay of captains and masters commandant, graduating the same upon the principle of assimilated rank, as recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

A statement of assimilated rank in the present state of the navy.

- There are in the navy thirty-seven captains,
 17 of whom have been in commission above fifteen years, and rank with a major general.
 3 have been in commission over ten and under fifteen years, and rank with a brigadier general.
 8 have been in commission under ten and over five years, and rank with a colonel.
 9 have been in commission under five years, and rank with a lieutenant colonel.

- 37
 There are in the navy thirty-three masters commandant, who rank with a major.

LANDS TO OFFICERS IN THE LATE WAR.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, MARCH 1, 1831.

MR. DUNCAN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom have been referred sundry memorials from the Legislatures of States, and of officers of the army of the United States in the late war with Great Britain, and who were disbanded at its termination, praying that lands may be granted to officers who served in that war, and were disbanded at its termination, and to the heirs of those who were killed in battle, or died in service, reported:

That they have given to the subject that serious and deliberate attention which its importance to the memorialists, in a pecuniary point of view, and to the nation, in the effects which its decision may have in aftertimes.

Before proceeding to pronounce the result of their deliberations, the committee will take a view of the proceedings which have already been had by the House upon this subject.

At the close of the war with Great Britain, a bill was reported to the House, fixing the military peace establishment of the United States, and for disbanding a portion of that gallant army which had so successfully carried the country through that war. The sixth section of that bill contained the following clause:

"That there shall, moreover, be allowed and granted to every such officer, [meaning those who should be disbanded,] in consideration of services during the late war, the following donations in land, viz. to a major general, 2,560 acres; to a brigadier general, 1,920 acres; to each colonel and lieutenant colonel, 1,280 acres; to each major, 960 acres; to each captain, 640 acres; to each subaltern, 480; and to the representatives of such officers as shall have fallen, or died in service, during the late war, the like number of acres, according to the rank they held, respectively, at the time of their decease, to be designated, surveyed, and laid off at the public expense."

On the 27th of February, 1815, a few days before the termination of the session, a motion was made by Mr. Cannon, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Tennessee, to strike out this portion of the bill. The question was taken by ayes and noes, and the motion prevailed by a majority of only four votes.

On the next day, the 29th February, 1815, a motion was made by Mr. Alston to reconsider the vote upon striking out the provision. The vote on reconsideration was also taken by ayes and noes, and prevailed by a majority of fourteen votes.

The question was then again put, on striking out the clause, and decided against it. Upon the second vote the ayes and noes were not taken; and the committee have learned that the opposition to it had been almost wholly, if not entirely, withdrawn in the House.

In this form the bill went to the Senate of the United States; in which body it was amended, by increasing the amount of force to be retained from six thousand to fifteen thousand men, and by striking out the bounty land provision.

On the 2d of March, the House of Representatives disagreed to the amendments of the Senate. On the same day, the Senate insisted on their amendments. The House also insisted: a conference was proposed, and agreed to by the House. The conferees reported a compromise, that the Senate should agree to reduce the army to ten thousand men, and that the House should abandon that portion of the bill which provided grants of land to the disbanded officers.

On the 3d of March, the last day of the session, and almost at its last hour, the compromise recommended by the conferees came up for consideration; and the question to agree to that portion of it which abandoned grants of land to the officers was taken by ayes and noes, and carried by a bare majority of two votes—ayes 57, noes 55. That part of the compromise which related to the number of men to be retained in service, was carried by a very large majority—70 to 38.

Thus, it will be perceived that these gallant men, at the only period when their claims came fairly before the House for decision, lost their land by only two votes, and that, too, in consequence of a compromise between the two Houses upon the subject of the quantum of force to be retained in the service.

At the succeeding session of Congress, (the 1st of the 14th,) the subject was again brought up; and on the 13th of December, 1816, a bill was reported to the House by its Committee on Military Affairs, authorizing grants of land to the disbanded officers of the late war, and the heirs and representatives of those who were killed or died in service.

This bill was permitted to remain without any action or decision thereon, until the Congress in which it was reported expired.

On the 9th December, 1817, the following resolution was introduced into the House:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law for the disbanded and deranged officers of the army of the United States who served in the late war against Great Britain, by donations in land, viz. to a major general 1,280 acres, a brigadier general 1,120 acres, a colonel and lieutenant colonel 960 acres each, a major 800 acres, a captain 640 acres, and subalterns 480 acres.

And no further action took place during the session.

Thus the matter remained until the first session of the nineteenth Congress, when it was again brought before the House by a simultaneous effort of the officers themselves. Their memorials were referred to a select committee, consisting of Mr. Cook, of Illinois, Mr. Garnsey, of New York, Mr. Swan, of New Jersey, Mr. Bailey, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Metcalfe, of Kentucky.

This committee, on the 17th of March, 1826, made a favorable report, which is herein embodied, viz.

"The select committee to which was referred the petition of sundry officers of the army of the late war, praying a grant of land, in consideration of their sacrifices and services, report:

"That it is deemed by the committee but fair and reasonable that the merits of their claim should be duly investigated and considered by the House. Their severe and arduous services, in the momentous struggle in which they were engaged, entitles their application to the most liberal consideration that justice and sound policy will allow. With a view, therefore, to bring the subject fairly before the House, and that it may act on the question unincumbered by details, the committee propose to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to make provision, by law, for granting to each of the officers of the army, who served during the late war, a quantity of land, according to their rank, as a remuneration for their sacrifices, sufferings, and faithful services."

The press of business usually attendant on the latter portion of a session of Congress precluded the possibility of a deliberate consideration of this report. It does not appear from the journals of the House that it ever came up for final decision.

At three subsequent sessions of Congress, viz. the second of the nineteenth, the first of the twentieth, and the first of the twenty-first, the subject was again referred to committees; but the multiplicity of more pressing or immediate concerns having so exclusively engrossed their attention as to preclude the possibility of devoting that attention to this subject which its magnitude and importance required, it passed off until the present time.

Thus, this subject has, with little intermission, been before Congress from the termination of the late war with Great Britain to the present time.

In the commencement of the war which terminated in establishing the independence of our country, pay and subsistence were the only rewards held out by the Government to their officers and soldiers. To their own exertions were they to be indebted for that greater and more inestimable reward—their own liberty, and that of their posterity. Yet, notwithstanding the great and inappreciable value of the prize which was to be won or lost, notwithstanding the overflowing patriotism of the country, the love of freedom inherent in man, and the desire to win it for himself, and to transmit it to his children, as well as the monthly pay promised the officers by the Government, it was found necessary, in order to stimulate the zeal and patriotism, enliven the drooping spirits of the officers of that army, and to induce them to continue in the army, to make them promises of large grants of land; accordingly, Congress, as early as the 16th of September, 1776, passed a resolve that the officers and soldiers of its army should receive grants of land. The salutary consequences, and the high importance of this promise, were seen almost as soon as it was adopted. Many highly meritorious officers, whose pecuniary embarrassments, or the situation of whose families, seemed to render it their duty to retire from the public service to provide for their families, buoyed up with the pleasing anticipation of this ultimate source of profit, abandoned their intentions to retire, and continued in the service till the final triumph of the cause in which they had acquired a consideration of no mean importance in any hotly contested war. But, in order the more clearly to show the sense entertained by the country of the importance of the services of the officers of the revolutionary army, several of the States of the Union, within whose boundaries or jurisdiction there were vacant and unappropriated lands, notwithstanding that the General Congress had already made liberal promises, following the generous impulse thus given, did, from time to time, provide liberal bounties in land for their respective State lines in the continental service.

Before the commencement of the late war with Great Britain, but after it was perceived that a controversy with that nation was no longer to be avoided, without a sacrifice of the independence which had been so nobly won by the army of the revolution, Congress, aware of the vast benefits which had resulted in the resolution from the promise of land to the soldiers, adopted the very same policy of promising grants of land to the privates.

By the act of December 24th, 1811, the soldiers, whose enlistment that act authorized, received one hundred and sixty acres; and subsequently, whilst the war which soon after followed was raging in its utmost fury, and to encourage enlistments, the quantum was increased to three hundred and twenty acres. It was in the army to which bounties were thus given to privates, that the memorialists were officers; and gallant officers the history of that war amply proves they were. If the soldiers of that army, and even the heirs of those who volunteered their services for a given and short period, but who were killed or died in service, had such large recognised claims on the bounty of the nation, it is not, in the opinion of the committee, easily to be perceived why their officers, who, by toil, industry, and sleepless nights, ministered to their wants, watched over their health and safety, drilled them into efficiency, brought them into the field, and fought at their head, have not claims equally strong.

Further, to show the inequality which appeared to have existed in the legislation of that day, a bounty of land was promised to the heirs of volunteers, including their officers, who might be killed or die in service; and regular bounties in land were promised to volunteers from Canada, including, specially, the officers of every grade, from a colonel to a subaltern. Many of these volunteer officers, both native and Canadian, fought side by side with the memorialists against the common enemy; and if, by the fortune of war, one of each description sealed his devotion to his country on the battle field by his life, the family of the volunteer would be rewarded by a grant of a large and valuable tract of public domain, to be an asylum and a home for the widow and the children of a gallant father, while the widow and the children of the officer of the regular army, whose claims upon his country, by every process of reasoning, must be admitted to be at least as strong as those of any volunteer of any description whatever, had to bear their loss, with no other reward but the sympathy of their friends, and the legacy of his brave and honorable name. But this is not all. There have been instances where officers have lost their lives in battle, or in the discharge of perilous duties, and whose papers at the same time were lost or destroyed, in which their heirs, instead of receiving a reward from the common stock for their irreparable loss, have been called upon to refund money to the public—moneys placed in the hands of their father for distribution, of the faithful application of which, in consequence of the loss of papers, no certain evidence could be produced; and, in the recovery of this doubtful debt, the home which had been left to the fatherless children has been sold from them, and they have been turned penniless upon the earth. This is no imaginary picture: the fact has occurred in more cases than one, and the memorials on the files of the House, it is believed, will attest it.

But it was not alone to the army of the revolution, the soldiers of the late war with Great Britain, and Canadian volunteers, that the policy of making grants of land has been confined; the principle has extended much further. On the 14th of August, 1776, land was promised to all those who would leave the service of England, and become residents of the States, without even requiring them to enter the service of the country. On the 23d of April, 1813, large grants of land were promised to subjects of the King of England who would abandon his provinces of Canada and Nova Scotia, and take refuge within the United States; and ample provision has been made, and at different times, recently, too, for giving full and complete effect to these promises.

In referring to these grants to native volunteers and Canadian volunteers in the late war, and to deserters and refugees in the war of the revolution, the committee do not wish to be understood as in any manner condemning the policy which dictated them; on the contrary, they believe it to have been the result of a wise forecast of the future. They have referred to them as an illustration of the singularity of the fact that these descriptions of persons should have been so liberally provided for, while the officers of the regular army, upon whom devolved the great burden of war, should be turned off, after having gloriously accomplished their work, with nothing but scars, broken constitutions, and, in many cases, ruined fortunes. It is true, they had the consolation knowing they had gloriously sustained the honor and the independence of their country.

The memorialists have themselves eloquently remarked that they have sought in vain for the reasons which should deprive the officers of the second war of independence of the munificence which was extended to those of the first; for although, as a body, they may not have suffered so much or so long, yet they exhibited the same valor and love of liberty. They did not, like the refugees, flee the realms of oppression in search of liberty in a foreign land; they protected the trees their fathers planted at home; and, as in the case of the Canadian volunteers, who abandoned the country of their enemy and joined a foreign standard, and then in company with the memorialists fought and foiled the enemy on his own soil, it is hoped that Congress, who have been so munificent to one, will not remain indifferent to the just claims of the other.

Contrast the case of the officers of the army with that of the officers of the navy in the war, and how great is the difference between them, and how exceedingly disadvantageous to the former. By the regulations of the naval service, the officers and men participated in every capture, great or small, which they might make. If the captured was less in force than the captor, half the amount was divided among the captors; if the opposing forces were equal, or if the captured were superior to the captor, the whole value became the property of the captors. By these wise and salutary regulations, an additional impulse was given to the ardent courage and daring enterprise of our naval officers and seamen. It is believed that almost every officer and seaman in that service realized a much larger sum in prize money than is the value of the land which it has been proposed to give to the officers of the army of correlative rank who served in the same war.

21st Cong. 2d Sess.]

How stands the case of the army? If a battle be won, a fortress stormed, a convoy of provisions or munitions of war be intercepted or captured, the soldier has nothing, the officer has nothing, all belongs to the public; no division of spoil here, as in the other great arm of national defence. It is a well known fact, that, while many of our gallant naval heroes came out of the war with splendid fortunes, won by their valor and good luck, not a single officer of the army retired from that service a whit the better in worldly goods; although he may have fought as desperately, and been as thickly covered with the laurels of victory, as his brothers of the navy.

It would, therefore, in this view of the subject, be but an act of common justice to make up this manifest inequality between the officers of the army and the navy, by a grant of land to the former.

The late war with Great Britain has been emphatically called the second war of independence; it has been so termed in papers, public, private, and official; it has been so termed in speeches, in Congress and out of Congress; it has been so considered at home and abroad; it has been so considered by statesmen and citizens, in and out of office. Why, then, is it not proper and expedient that a portion at least of the same measure of reward which was meted out to the gallant and glorious band of the revolution, should also be meted out to those who, in a later period, fought so valiantly and so gloriously for the preservation and perpetuation of the blessings won in the first contest? If it is improper or inexpedient to do so, your committee are unable to perceive it. The committee have here used the phrase "a portion of the measure of reward meted out to the gallant band of the revolution."

The reason for using that phrase, is to be understood in reference to the many acts of munificence to the officers of that army, which have not been, nor is it contemplated ever will be, extended to the officers of the late army. Witness the half pay for life granted to the survivors; the half pay for seven years granted to the widows and orphans of those who were killed or died in service; the subsequent commutation of half pay for life; the full pay for life granted to the survivors by the act of May, 1828; and the bill passed by the House at the present session of Congress, extending the provisions of former acts to all those who by any technicality in said acts had not been brought within their provisions; also, over the militia; to say nothing of the vast benefits conferred by acts of 1818 and 1820.

Surely, when all these grants to the heroes of the revolution are considered, it cannot be deemed unreasonable to grant the small boon of a tract of waste, unappropriated land to the heroes of the late war.

The more clearly to illustrate the claims of the memorialists to some further compensation for their services, and to show the inequality which has been made to exist between the officers of the late army and the officers of the present army, the committee herewith present an exhibit, showing the difference between the monthly and annual pay and emoluments of the officers of the two armies respectively, of correlative rank, and, also, showing the total amount which that monthly difference would give in three years.

This difference is owing to an increase of rations, and contingent allowances made to the present army, and properly made, in the opinion of the committee, and is only mentioned for the purpose of showing that the officers in question were not fully compensated.

The committee have not gone through the whole descriptive list of officers of an army; nor have they taken into the account those of the staff who hold commissions in the line. The grades they have omitted bear the same relative portion of difference in pay, &c. as those they have enumerated. With respect to the staff taken from the line, the difference is still greater against the late army, as the additional pay and emoluments of the staff is not only greater now than in 1814, but the numbers of that description of officers are also much greater, in proportion to the strength of the army, than it was during the late war, thereby greatly multiplying the chances of increase of pay to the younger officers of the present army.

From this relative view of the pay and emoluments of officers of the army of 1814, and the army of 1831, it would appear that the difference against the officers of the late war, for the average period of three years, is more than double the value of the land which it has been proposed to grant them; and, as it respects the inferior officers, it is more than quadrupled. Thus, on the score of evenhanded and common justice, it would seem but fair that their claim should be granted, were there no striking or peculiar circumstances of difference in the time or manner of their employments. That difference is too great, in every respect, to be passed over without suggestion. In the first place, it is a fact well known that every species of provision and clothing was at least fifty per cent. higher during the late war than at the present period; a fact, which your committee humbly conceive, of itself, sufficient to induce Congress to grant the prayer of the memorialists. The nature of the employment of the officers of the two periods, if also considered, would entitle those in a state of active and desperate warfare with a brave and wily enemy, and who were at the same time constantly subjected to every species of privation and suffering, and to all the dangers, casualties, and vicissitudes of war, to a preference over those who are only engaged in the peace occupations of an army, however faithful and well the duties of the latter may be discharged.

It is useless to pursue further the parallel between the emoluments of officers of the two periods; in every view in which it may be placed, the disadvantage is presented in bolder and bolder relief against the brave and suffering band of the late war.

At all periods in which this subject has undergone the serious and deliberate investigation of committees of the House, it is worthy of remark, that it has received a favorable consideration, and that at no period has any unfavorable opinion been expressed, either by the House itself, or by either of its committees. The only time in which the subject came fully before the House for discussion, and was discussed after the most serious deliberation, it was passed in the House, and failed only by reason of a compromise between the two Houses at the last expiring moments of a laborious and anxious session of Congress, (in which it was indispensably necessary that a portion of the army should be disbanded,) upon a disagreement between the two Houses as to the quantum of force to be retained in service; a question, in the then deranged state of the finances of the country, of paramount importance. The friends of this measure, under all the circumstances of the case, patriotically waived the claims of the suffering officers, but never contemplated their abandonment.

From the course pursued in the war of the revolution, it is fair to infer that a like course would have been pursued in the late war, had that war continued but a year or two longer. Congress did not, at the commencement of the revolutionary contest, provide for grants of land to their officers; that promise was not made until some years had elapsed; yet it was made. Had the late war continued a year or two longer, there is every reason to believe that a like course would have been pursued. The officers themselves expected it; they conceived it due to them as an expression of the feeling of the Government for their sufferings and privations, as well as a reward for their services and sacrifices; and that they still think it due to them, is evidenced by the reiteration of their claims.

The present condition of many of these brave and patriotic men requires that they should no longer be neglected or postponed. Some, it is true, may be in easy and flourishing circumstances; but it is believed to be a fact, that a majority of those who are in existence, are far from being placed in such a situation as to render these grants a matter of indifference, or of little or no concern. Many of them have since sought employment, and found an honorable grave in a foreign land. Many of them are known to be in needy circumstances, residing on the public lands, on that frontier which they so faithfully and gallantly defended, while the widows and orphans of others are in poverty and want; and if the grant were now made, it would be esteemed as a boon sent, as it were, from heaven, to relieve their wants and distresses.

The usage of this, as well as of almost all other Governments, gave the officers of the late army reason to expect, that, after the close of their toils, and peace and security had been secured at home, and respect had been enforced abroad, they would be recompensed by some flattering and substantial testimonial of their country's gratitude. Without such a feeling as this, it is impossible to suppose that officers of inferior grades would have remained so long in the service, as it is notorious that their pay was wholly inadequate to their maintenance in the field; and, however patriotic they may have been, necessity would soon have driven them into retirement. It was because they were buoyed up by this hope, that they remained.

The committee have observed, that it is the usage of Governments to give some additional as well as substantial evidence of the country's gratitude to those who have been its defenders in the hour of peril or calamity: sound policy has ever dictated this course; and monarchs even, however despotic, have seldom, if ever, been found to neglect it. This Government, no more than that of any other country, has no patent right for the preservation of its peace, or for its protection against foreign aggression; and, should the time again come, when it will need the assistance of its citizens in a similar or other controversy, it would find its account in doing, even at this late period, that which it ought to have done years ago, and which is now sought to be done.

It is, therefore, the opinion of the committee, that the officers of the army in the late war with Great Britain have strong claims upon the justice as well as upon the liberality of the country, and that every noble principle of our nature requires us to satisfy them. Under these several views of the subject, and of many others which time does not permit the committee to enumerate, they have come to the conclusion that it is just, politic, and expedient, to grant the prayer of the memorialists, and generally to make provision for a grant of land to such officers as were disbanded in the consolidation of regiments during, and who served to the close of the late war with Great Britain, and were disbanded at its termination, and for the heirs of those who died or were killed in service; and for this purpose the committee herewith report a bill.

COPY-RIGHT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, DECEMBER 17, 1830.

Mr. ELLSWORTH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the laws relating to copy-right, presented to the House, for its adoption, the bill accompanying this report:

At the second session of the first Congress, a statute was passed to secure to authors the copy-right of their books, charts, and maps. In 1802, a like statute was passed to secure the copy-right of prints. In both of these statutes, there are provisions which are useless and burdensome, and in which there are likewise discrepancies. It has furthermore been claimed, and, it seems to your committee, with propriety, that the law of copy-right ought to extend to musical compositions, as does the English law. It has been the aim of your committee, in preparing the accompanying bill, to bring the two statutes into one, and to make that free from the objections alluded to, but chiefly to enlarge the period for the enjoyment of copy-right, and thereby to place authors in this country more nearly upon an equality with authors in other countries.

The power of securing the rights of authors, by giving them a copy-right, is, by the constitution, exclusively vested in Congress; and your committee think that the object contemplated is well worthy of the consideration and legislation of Congress. While, for the most obvious reasons, the United States ought to be foremost among nations in encouraging science and literature, by securing the fruits of intellectual labor, she is, in this thing, very far behind them all, as a reference to their laws will show.

In the United States, by the existing laws, a copy-right is secured to the author, in the first instance, for fourteen years; and if, at the end of that period, he be living, then for fourteen years more; but, if he be not then living, the copy-right is determined, although, by the very event of the death of the author, his family stand in more need of the only means of subsistence ordinarily left to them. In England, the right of an author to the exclusive and perpetual profits of his book was enjoyed, and never questioned, until it was decided in Parliament, by a small vote, in the case of Miller vs. Taylor, in the year 1769, and contrary to a decision of the same case in the King's Bench, that the statute of Ann had abridged the common law right, which, it was conceded, had existed, instead of merely guarding and securing it by forfeitures for a limited time, as was obviously intended. But Parliament, feeling the injustice of the statute of Ann, thus construed, afterwards passed a statute, which is now the law of that kingdom, securing to an author a copy-right for twenty-eight years, and, if he be living at the end of that period, for his life. In France, before 1826, a copy-right was secured to the author for life, to his widow for her life, and then to his children for twenty-six years. In 1826, the King appointed a numerous board of commissioners to revise the law of literary property. They reported a bill extending the period of enjoyment to fifty years after the death of the author, which is now the law of France. In Russia, a copy-right is secured for life, and twenty years afterwards. In Germany, Norway, and Sweden, the right is held to be perpetual.

It is believed that this comparison shows that the United States are far behind the States of Europe in securing the fruits of intellectual labor, and in encouraging men of letters.

Your committee believe that the just claims of authors require from our legislation a protection not less than what is proposed in the bill reported. Upon the first principles of proprietorship in property, an author has an exclusive and perpetual right, in preference to any other, to the fruits of his labor. Though the nature of literary property is peculiar, it is not the less real and valuable. If labor and effort in producing what before was not possessed or known, will give title, then the literary man has title, perfect and absolute, and should have his reward: he writes and he labors as assiduously as does the mechanic or husbandman. The scholar, who secludes himself, and wastes his life, and often his property, to enlighten the world, has the best right to the profits of those labors: the planter, the mechanic, the professional man, cannot prefer a better title to what is admitted to be his own. Nor is there any doubt what the interest and honor of the country demand on this subject. We are justly proud of the knowledge and virtue of our fellow-citizens. Shall we not encourage the means of that knowledge, and enlighten that virtue, so necessary to the security and judicious exercise of civil and political rights? We ought to present every reasonable inducement to influence men to consecrate their talents to the advancement of science. It cannot be for the interest or honor of our country that intellectual labor should be depreciated, and a life devoted to research and laborious study terminate in disappointment and poverty.

Your committee do not perceive any reason for denying to authors the protection of the law, to the extent proposed. There is no serious danger of a monopoly. The question is, whether the author or the bookseller shall reap the reward. It is for the interest of the author to supply the market upon such terms as will ensure the greatest sale; and he will always do this.

This bill secures to the author a copy-right for twenty-eight years, in the first instance, with a right of renewal for fourteen more, if, at the end of the first period, the author be living, or shall leave a family. It is believed that the provisions of the bill are not too liberal, and that Congress ought not to do less than is proposed. Even this is less than is done in any one of the European States referred to.

MILEAGE OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JANUARY 7, 1831.

Mr. HALL, from the Committee on Public Expenditures, to which was referred a resolution of the House relative to a uniform rule for estimating mileage of members of Congress, reported:

That the subject, upon investigation, seems attended with difficulties which render it impracticable to establish any rule which will operate entirely equal. That the existing law, if its plain and evident intention is carried into effect, will approximate sufficiently near equality to render any alteration unnecessary, unless a rule is adopted to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, with the aid of each member of either House, and Delegate of a Territory, assisted by the Postmaster General, to make an estimate, as nearly as possible, of the actual distance (in a direct line) of the residence of each Member, Senator, and Delegate, from the seat of Government; and that the mileage of Senators, Members, and Delegates, be computed according to such estimate. It did not seem expedient to the committee to adopt this principle in the shape of a bill; and it is believed that no other method would arrive at or approximate to equality so nearly as to render a change of the law materially beneficial. It seems evident to the committee, that the intention of the law of 1818 is simply this: that each member is to be paid for the miles he does travel, and not for those he does not travel; but that the miles which he does travel, and for which he is to receive pay, are the miles usually or most generally travelled, from the neighborhood or part of the country in which he resides. This seems to be the obvious intention of the law; and it is not to be supposed that members of Congress were to have any greater or lesser privileges in travelling to and from the seat of Government than other people. And it is presumed, if due attention was paid to this principle, though there would still, from the very nature of things, be variations, yet, in the main, equality and justice might generally be as nearly arrived at as by any other mode of computation; unless, indeed, the restrictive principle, under the supervision of the members, the officers of the two Houses, and the Postmaster General, already alluded to, should be adopted. This, if equality is the object, is decidedly preferable; but, if retrenchment is the end in view, a reduction of the amount for every twenty miles, from what it now is, would be the remedy. But even the restricted method could not arrive at equality. We have heard here a great deal about constructive journeys. Does any man believe that it was the intention of the law that members should be paid for journeys they did not make? There have been very great apparent errors committed; and the committee, in discharge of their duty, in seeking the aid of the Postmaster General, have, so far from having obtained from that source such certainty as might, though very erroneously, have been supposed to be in possession of that officer, been sustained in their opinion of the difficulties attending the subject, by the following remarks: "The course now pursued by the Post Office Department is, where the distance has not been ascertained by actual survey, to obtain from different postmasters on a route the stated distances from one office to another. These, in some few instances, have been obtained by measurement, especially on turnpike roads; but by far the greater proportion of them are given by mere estimate, according to the reputed distances in their neighborhoods. The reports of postmasters of the estimated distances often differ considerably one from another; in some instances, from five to ten per cent. In such cases, the mean is generally taken." Again, he says, "No rate can be given to equalize the mileage of members of Congress, unless the several distances should be ascertained by actual measurement: an approximation is all that could be hoped for. Perhaps the post route on which the mail is most usually transported would come as near to the object sought as any other general rule that could be laid down." And, in conclusion, he observes: "Probably the most eligible plan would be, to take the most usual post route as the criterion for a general rule, subject to such exceptions as Congress, in their wisdom, should deem advisable."

The committee will suggest that, should it be the will of the House that either of the plans presented in this report should be adopted, or that it should, by a specific act, be made the duty of the Committee of Accounts of both Houses, who have the subject, respectively for each, specially committed to them, that then the Committee on Public Expenditures, or any other appropriate committee, be imperatively required to report to that effect by bill.

The Committee on Public Expenditures having been instructed by the resolution to inquire into the subject, have done so; and, being unable to come to or devise any definite plan, ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

DUTY ON IMPORTED SALT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 3, 1831.

Mr. MALLARY, from the Committee on Manufactures, to whom was referred the "memorial of the manufacturers of salt in Kenhawa county, Virginia, praying for a restoration of the duty on imported salt," presented to the House the following report:

Duty on Imported Salt.

[21st Cong. 2d Sess.]

The committee have taken the same into consideration, and are fully of opinion that the laws of the last session of Congress, reducing the duty on foreign salt, ought to be suspended from further operation. The reasons for that opinion they respectfully offer to the House. They will be stated with all the brevity which the subject allows.

The committee consider salt as an article of first necessity, demanded alike by the rich and poor. It is essential, at least, to a comfortable support of human life. It is useful in many of the arts, and all-important to the great agricultural interests of the country. Its value cannot be estimated too high. It is on the ground that it is an article of general and all-pervading necessity, that the committee wish to consider the subject. It seems, therefore, to the committee, that the higher it ranks among the articles required by necessity, the more imperious is the duty of the Government to provide for its production. It ought not to be exposed to danger from any cause which can be averted. The more earnestly this or any other article may be demanded by necessity, the greater should be our exertions to secure an ample and permanent supply. We should provide against all contingencies which may produce want and distress among the people. Nothing ought to be left to chance, when perfect or even partial security can be attained.

Food and raiment may supply the earliest and most pressing wants. The great mass of our people could provide these from the soil, aided by household labor and a few mechanic arts, which never fail to spring up within the narrow circles of society. After these are obtained, nothing can come more effectually to the relief of want than the article in question. Coffee, tea, sugar, silks—a thousand things would be abandoned before salt could be dispensed with.

Should war again take place with the great maritime Power of Europe; should other nations, from which we derive a portion of our supplies, in a fit of jealousy or retaliation, interrupt our trade; should our own Government resort again to non-intercourse or non-importation; should any sudden revolution in commerce take place, all can see the dangers to which our people would be exposed.

The means of procuring a full and adequate supply exist in our own country. They are found on the long line of our seacoast, in numerous parts of our deep interior. The manufacture already exists, to a greater or lesser extent, in nineteen of the twenty-four States of the Union. Investments of capital, improvements for perfecting the article, were daily making, and would have continued with accelerated rapidity, had they not been partially arrested by the act of last session.

If our country must depend on a foreign supply, the consumers of all classes are exposed to other dangers. The greatest proportion of imports will be made in our principal seaports. The salt trade is conducted by comparatively a few. It is not cut up and divided as much as that of other branches of foreign business. It is generally received by our shipping rather as ballast than for the purposes of profitable freight. It is easily monopolized. Our merchants on the seaboard could, whenever they pleased, take it under their own control. Like every other class of our citizens, they are in pursuit of gain. To monopolize an article at common prices, and then demand exorbitant profits, is no uncommon occurrence. To-day the market is glutted, and prices settle down to the lowest point, when monopoly advances, and grasps the whole. Next week there seems to be a scarcity, and prices advance as high as speculation can reach. This is considered one of the most capital operations of trade. No article has been more under its influence than salt. If, of late, it has been less so, it is owing to the great domestic production. The effects of this will be more fully explained in this report.

Besides the common danger of dependence on external supply, it is heightened by a knowledge of the fact that a great proportion of that supply is derived from a single nation and its dependencies.

In 1826, we received from Great Britain and its dependencies, -	3,533,796 bushels.
From all other places, -	1,030,924

In all, -	4,564,720 bushels.
-----------	--------------------

In 1829, from Great Britain and its dependencies, -	4,114,047 bushels.
From all other places, -	1,831,500

In all, -	5,945,547 bushels.

Even under the influence of the great domestic supply, during the past season, salt in some of our cities rose to 55 cents the bushel; recently it sold at 42½. It was supposed by many that the advance was caused by a belief that the domestic production would have been limited under the influence of the act of last session. But, had the recent sales been effected at 10 cents, instead of 42½, the country trader will be required to pay the common market price, when he shall resort to the emporium to replenish his store next spring.

This also applies, in some degree, to the country trade. The great proportion of Northern mercantile business concentrates in New York. It is carried on chiefly at some annual periods, spring and fall. Country merchants understand with great accuracy the condition of their customers, what supplies are needed, and what proportion, among several in the same town or village, each usually furnishes. All are careful not to overstock the market. If one purchases in New York at a price reduced to the lowest point from some accidental cause, and ten days after his neighbor purchases at a higher price of five or ten cents per bushel, still they both must offer the article in the same market. Should the highest purchaser feel confident that he can dispose of what he has bought in a reasonable time, he will keep up the price to meet cost and profit. This is equally known to the lowest purchaser, and he can safely ask the same price for what cost him much less than it cost the other. Hence it is evident that the consumer gains little or nothing by the common fluctuations of trade; he pays for all the profits of monopoly and speculation, and enjoys no equivalent in return. It would seem that these remarks apply with even greater force to the vast population west of the mountains, in the broad valley of the Mississippi.

The quantity of salt imported into New Orleans, in 1830, was a little less than 400,000 bushels. The quantity manufactured on the Western waters amounted to about 2,400,000. The present consumption requires at least 2,800,000. From the rapid increase of population, 3,500,000 bushels in a short period will be required, and the ratio of increased consumption will rapidly advance for half a century to come. Suppose the required supply should be imported, the importation must, of necessity, be confined to a few individuals; it would be exposed to all the varied causes of fluctuating trade. New Orleans would be the only door through which it could pass to the immense Western regions. It must be bought at all events. Concentrated at one point, it could be gathered up by monopoly, having unlimited capital at control, and dealt out to waiting want and necessity, at prices which speculation might please to demand. A domestic supply is now certain, and may be forever secured. It can never be controlled by any external circumstances. Domestic monopoly cannot exist to any dangerous extent among nearly a hundred establishments, scattered along a line of a thousand miles, and where new sources of supply, to any extent, may be opened whenever they may be required.

It appears, by the evidence before the committee, and annexed to this report, that there has been a steady and rapid decline in the price of salt in the Western country since 1820. At Nashville, Tennessee, in the years 1817, '18, '19, and '20, salt sold from two to three dollars per bushel of fifty pounds. The present price is 62½ cents; 75 cents is the average price for the past year. At Louisville, the price, during the season past, has been from 45 to 50 cents. In Madisonville, Indiana, the price, for the past twelve months, has been 50 cents per bushel. At St. Louis, during the same period, the price has varied from 56 to 62½ cents.

It would seem that when the article can be obtained in abundance at such prices, there is no substantial reason for complaint, more especially when it is mainly owing to the domestic supply, produced under the influence of protecting duties, and, also, when there is every reason to anticipate a continued reduction if the domestic manufacturer may be permitted to pursue his course unmolested.

By some, it may be supposed, that, if prices are advanced by monopoly or the fluctuations of trade, the manufacturer can participate in the advantages equally with the dealer in the foreign article. This would be impossible. It is only by a regular, steady demand and price that he can pursue his business. When there will be a glut in the market, when scarcity, when monopoly will control, he cannot foresee. An extraordinary depression in price, for a season, may ruin him. His capital may be wasted before remunerating prices return. It requires years for the manufacturer to make preparations; the rise of all prices may be effected in a moment. Uncertainty will prevent the use of establishments already in existence, and new ones will not be undertaken.

The committee cannot discover any object more valuable, more national, more vitally important to the country, than a steady, uniform, abundant, and uncontrollable supply of an article so essential at all times to every rank and condition of life. It should be secured by all reasonable means which the Government can command. It is easily accomplished by a just improvement of the resources which the nation possesses within itself in the fullest abundance. By pursuing this course, the numerous dangers to which our people are perpetually exposed while dependent on foreign supply, would be readily averted.

The committee would now allude to the effects which clearly have been produced by the domestic manufacture of salt. On an average for each of the last five years, it amounted to about 4,250,000 bushels. Importations for the same period, annually, have averaged about 5,500,000 bushels; the annual consumption of all kinds, 9,750,000. Suppose the domestic manufacture destroyed—the annual production of 4,250,000 annihilated—what must be the consequence? The effect, for a season, might be, perhaps, to depress prices, because a good supply, both of foreign and domestic salt, is on hand, waiting the ordinary demands of consumption. In anticipation of an advance in price, the foreign surplus, if any, or even a draught on common supply from abroad, might be made, and thrown into our markets. A momentary glut would take place, and depression of price might follow. But another consequence would rapidly succeed. The domestic production of nearly one-half which the country consumes would be nearly destroyed, and a limited supply take place. This would, of course, be attended with the highest prices. But the work of destruction would be completed. This great necessary of life would depend on foreign labor, foreign capital, the vicissitudes of foreign trade, and of foreign and domestic speculation. The ruins of our manufactures would be a perpetual warning against any further effort. Should, at some future day, the wants of the country offer protection, prudence would avoid the allurements to another sacrifice.

The committee would offer another reason in favor of retaining the former duty on foreign salt. As has been observed, one of the greatest dangers to which the consumers of salt would be exposed, is a monopoly of the article by the dealers on the seaboard, if we depended solely on a foreign supply. This has been in a great measure prevented by the immense quantity manufactured in the United States. If an effort was made by speculators to raise the price of the foreign article exorbitantly high by monopoly, country dealers would leave it on their hands. If they should purchase and transport it to the interior, the people would not purchase, because a great stock of domestic salt is always to be found, or can be easily obtained, at moderate rates. Before this could be exhausted, sales of the foreign article must be made. Country capital would fail in the contest. Prices given to seaboard speculation would come down to prices demanded by the domestic article. Here is the distinct cause why a monopoly by our seaboard merchants would be wholly unavailing. But should the country depend entirely on the foreign importations, or chiefly, every one can readily perceive the danger to which all classes of consumers would be exposed. Little sympathy would be felt for them by those who were gaining fortunes, even at the expense of want and suffering. The country dealers must purchase, and could safely purchase. The people must buy of the merchant, or live without; to no other source of supply could they look. If the domestic manufacture flourishes, the people can pass by the foreign article with indifference. Those along the seacoast can find it there; those in the North can find abundance at the great salt works of New York: from thence it is readily distributed, by canals and lakes, to every part of the interior. The West can be supplied abundantly from its own resources. Monopoly finds a barrier against its operations in every part of the country. In case of war or interruption of commerce, and foreign supply is withheld, every thing is prepared for an extension to meet every possible want.

Another reason is offered. The domestic manufacture employs and sustains thousands of our people. They have been diverted from other pursuits, already reduced to the lowest point of profit. The people around the manufactories, for a considerable distance, can obtain a supply in exchange for various articles, which they have to spare, and which could not bear transportation to those places where foreign salt is obtained.

Again: Four or five millions of bushels of salt greatly multiply domestic exchanges. The operation is generally confined to the interior, and most of the direct and immediate benefits begin and end there. This, it is true, may diminish the business of those engaged in the foreign salt trade, and may be the sole cause, in the minds of many, for desiring a total suppression of the domestic manufacture. All know that the sharp eye of foreign commerce has watched, and is watching, the progress of domestic industry with jealous alarm. In a case like the present, where the foreign article must, of necessity, pass through the hands of the seaboard merchants, it is very natural that they, like all other classes of people, should suppose that whatever business was profitable to them, must contribute to the general good; that nothing could be useful to the country unless they shared in the profits. It, therefore, becomes the duty of the Government to examine the interests of all with strict impartiality, consider them fairly, and adjust them in a manner best calculated to promote the prosperity of every portion of our country.

The committee considering, also, that the article of salt is one of indispensable necessity; that to depend on foreign nations for a supply would be almost as dangerous as to allow them to control the air; that a superintending Providence has placed the means of abundance within the undisturbed dominion of our own people and Government, it clearly comes within the range of the protecting power and policy. It does not belong to that class of articles on which duties were laid for revenue alone. No one ever supposed that the duty on tea, pepper, pimento, cinnamon, Peruvian bark, capers, and olives, was intended to protect or encourage their production. They have no connexion with the protecting tariff. Duty on these was for revenue; and when revenue is no longer wanted, it may be repealed with perfect safety. But this by no means implies that duties which really effectually sustain some valuable branch of domestic industry, should be abandoned. Even a surplus in the treasury would be a lesser evil.

The committee will proceed to consider the measures adopted by the Government in relation to salt, and the claims which the manufacturer has to a continued support.

The first duty on salt was imposed by the act of Congress, in 1789. Its preamble declares, "Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, and for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported." In this preamble is found a full and ample recognition of the power to encourage and protect manufactures, instantaneously following the adoption of the constitution. On salt was laid a duty of six cents per bushel—a duty higher, in proportion to the foreign value of the article, than was laid on almost every other. It must have been well known in our early life as a nation, how dangerous and unavailing it was to look abroad for a supply. All of the members who composed the Congress of 1789, must have seen the miseries of the revolution; most of them must have largely shared in the common sufferings. The policy of encouraging and protecting the domestic manufacture was prompted by a full knowledge of the privations of a patriot army, in every degree of distress, of the wants of the whole country. During the last war, also, our farmers, the middling classes, and the poor, well remember how dear was the price of the article, and how difficult to obtain it. Then the Government and people urged on the manufacturer to the greatest exertion; even called it patriotic, and promised faithful, cordial, and lasting support. If, during the late war and restrictions on foreign commerce, our people suffered less, it must be admitted that it was entirely owing to the vigorous efforts of our manufacturers. But, when open and apparent danger seems to be removed to a distance, appeals are often made to the supposed interests of the middling classes and the poor, to sacrifice those who provided for their wants in the time of their utmost need.

By the act of August, 1790, the duty on foreign salt was advanced to twelve cents the bushel. In 1797, the duty on each bushel was twenty cents. This act remained in force for ten years. In 1807, all duties on salt were abolished. The committee are advised from the best authority, that no reduction of prices was the consequence. By the act of July, 1813, the duty of twenty cents per bushel was again imposed, to take effect on the 1st January, 1814, and to continue in operation until the end of the then existing war, and one year afterwards. By the act of April, 1816, on a general revision of the tariff, the duty of twenty cents per bushel on salt was made perpetual. The tariff of 1816 was intended to provide a revenue, and at the same time to be so adjusted as to give efficient protection to the different branches of manufacture which had sprung into existence from previous protection, or from restrictions on commerce, or from the war itself. The tariff, as a protecting system, since 1816, has been twice revised, and at each time the protecting duties have been augmented on almost every article of foreign production which came in competition with the domestic manufacture, excepting the single article of salt. The duty on that is now twenty cents per bushel, the same as was laid by the act of 1797, repealed in 1807, and re-enacted in 1813. From this brief history of our legislation on the subject, from the deep root which the manufacture of salt has taken in the country; from the sacrifices about to be required of a numerous body of our fellow-citizens, and from the exposure of the whole country to the dangers which have been described, the committee most respectfully repeat the hope that the House will review its opinion, as expressed in the act of the last session. Could the Government have given more decisive assurances of support to any branch of manufacture than it has to this? Could our fellow-citizens have asked a more solemn pledge of support than has been given? It was never urged on the Government by manufacturers; it was not the result of anxious and urgent solicitations on their part, but a spontaneous movement on the part of the Government itself, to accomplish a great national object. The voice of experience was then heard; its admonitions were then felt; and it might have been hoped, that, in peace and prosperity, they would not have been forgotten.

It appears that the capital invested in the manufacture of salt amounts to about $7,000,000. The product, in 1829, may be safely estimated at 4,500,000 bushels. The amount manufactured in 1830 has already diminished, from alarm caused by the recent reduction of duty. The number of persons actually engaged is about 3,600. They, with those immediately dependent, will make an aggregate of 14,000. And here it may be remarked, that, to sustain this great number of people, agricultural products, to an immense amount, are constantly required. These are obtained in exchange, in a great degree, for the article manufactured. But they are so scattered over the surface of our extended country, that the market they afford escapes superficial observation. If they, or a fourth part, were concentrated at any one point of the country, the effects would be most distinctly apparent. The little army during the late war stationed on our frontiers, drew supplies for hundreds of miles around it. Our farmers and mechanics well knew how great was the market it afforded. Had it been dispersed in companies over nineteen States, like the manufacturers of salt, the effects would have been scarcely perceptible, although, in the aggregate, equally important to the whole country, in furnishing a market with supplies, as if it had been assembled in one encampment.

The committee cannot avoid the repetition of the statement, that the duty of twenty cents was laid as early as 1797, and continued, with but a single interruption, to 1830. At the time of that interruption, the manufacture had scarcely commenced. From 1813 to the last session, a period of seventeen years, during which time the protecting tariff having undergone repeated changes and modifications, the duty on salt has been undisturbed and untouched. During this period of seventeen years, the manufacture has been rapidly increasing, and the quality daily improved by advancing skill and continued experience. Why, then, should so many thousands of our fellow-citizens be abandoned at a time when they supposed themselves reposing in perfect security under the protecting shield of their Government? It is a republican Government, and bound to protect its citizens in their various pursuits, and most especially when that Government has allured them to engage in new occupations, which are giving every promise of success, and are contributing largely to the independence of the country. When orders in council from England, and decrees of Napoleon, exposed neutral commerce to every peril on the ocean, our merchants, with open eyes, encountered all hazards. Their enterprise exposed them to spoliations. Aided by a general sympathy, the help of Government has been repeatedly invoked to their assistance. Its utmost exertions have been made, and are now making, to obtain indemnity. Appeals have been often made to the honor and dignity of the nation, to demand redress, even by arms. The committee hope thousands of humble manufacturers of salt may be objects of national regard.

The committee will refer to an argument which has been used, and which, it is supposed, was attended with considerable influence: it was the imposition of a duty of twelve and one-half cents per bushel, by the State of New York, on all salt manufactured in her limits. It was supposed by many to be unjust, in a single State, to tax a domestic production, which entered into general use, for the purpose of filling her treasury, when, as they supposed, she was enabled to do so by a duty laid by the General Government on a similar foreign article. Were the interests of that State alone involved, this opinion might be correct. But a wider view must be taken; we must see how far other parts of the Union are concerned.

The committee consider the duty imposed by the Government of New York is both just and equitable. This, it is fully believed, can be sustained, without resorting to the particular interests of that State for assistance.

The great canal policy of New York has been executed. As was anticipated by the liberal and expanded views of her statesmen, the benefits would not, could not, be confined within her own boundaries. They would be carried, in a greater or less proportion, to every part of the Union; they would promote, in an ample degree, the commercial operations of our country with the whole world. To a great extent, it equalizes the inequalities of nature. It places our people of the interior, in some degree, in possession of comforts and enjoyments, which, without it, would be confined to those who occupy the banks of some frith of the ocean.

Among other considerations which urged on the completion of the Erie canal, were the benefits to be derived from the improvement of the rich salt springs near the centre of the State. Unless in time of war or commercial embarrassments, when the article of salt could command any price which want and suffering could pay, they were of little value to the State or the country at large. Hence was derived one of the strongest inducements to perform that great work. The effect has fully answered expectation. Every farmer, the middling classes, and the poor, now enjoy a full proportion of the advantages which have resulted.

In 1829, the quantity of salt manufactured in that State was 1,291,000 bushels, or nearly one-seventh of all consumed in the United States. This, by inland navigation, is added to the common stock of the country, and tends to diminish the common price to the consumer. Before the canals were constructed, our farmers remember that they cheerfully paid six or seven dollars per barrel for Onondaga salt of a miserable quality; now they obtain a superior article for one-third of that price. The difference in price is mainly caused by the difference in expense between land and water transportation. If the Erie canal had not been completed, the manufacture would have been trifling, and the benefits confined to narrow limits. In times of scarcity, produced by any cause, the people of the great Northern section of the country could have no relief from that source, unless at the most enormous expense. Now, happen what may, they are secure of an abundant supply, at reasonable prices.

It cannot, therefore, be unreasonable or unjust in the State of New York to demand some remuneration for her exertions and expenditures from those who participate so largely in the advantages which have been produced. The tax sinks into insignificance when the causes of its imposition are understood. To require a surrender of the duty at this time, and under circumstances which have been explained, is clearly inequitable and unjust. When the canals were first finished, and while their first benefits were flowing wide, then the State tax on salt was never made the subject of complaint. What was considered, a few years ago, a just and honest claim, is now, in the minds of many, nothing short of palpable oppression.

It is also urged, that, if the State of New York can lay a duty on the domestic article, it affords evidence that the manufacture has gained such an ascendancy that protection is no longer required. If this is correct, the argument exhausts itself. If the domestic article has become so cheap and abundant as to bear an excise, the removal of the foreign duty would produce no practical effect. Supposed relief could exist only in theoretical imagination.

But the committee are fully convinced that no manufactory of salt, of any importance, could bear taxation, except that in the State of New York. The causes are apparent. One is, the superior quality of the salines, and the inexhaustible supply of mineral water which they afford; another, the extended and unceasing market found along the great Western lakes, along the valley of Lake Champlain and the Hudson, through the interior of the State. Hence, a capital of above three millions of dollars has been invested, and labor stimulated to its utmost exertion. Another, the facilities afforded by canal navigation in the transportation of fuel from places at which it is the most abundantly and most cheaply supplied; but, above all, the ease, the economy, and rapidity, with which it can be distributed to millions of consumers, from Champlain to Green Bay. No other manufacturing establishments in the United States enjoy these advantages in so great a degree. A tax, which may be safely laid on the manufacture in that State, would prostrate every other manufactory in the Union. It would, therefore, seem unreasonable to subject all the manufacturing establishments of the country to the pains and penalties of destruction, because New York, at the price of enormous expenditures on her own account, has improved her natural resources beyond any other State; especially when, with the duty imposed, she furnishes the article of salt as cheap as it can be supplied from any other source. That State has a perfect right, and possesses the power, to counteract the effects of national legislation on this subject. If it is exercised, none have just reason to complain.

The committee do not suppose that every manufactory of salt in the United States will be destroyed, if the act of the last session should take full effect. Some few possess such natural advantages, that they may continue in full or partial operation. But it is considered that the greatest proportion must surrender to inevitable ruin.

It has been repeatedly urged, that the quality of domestic salt is decidedly inferior to the foreign, and wholly unfit for some of the most important uses for which it is required. Some suppose it wants strength; others, that it is combined with ingredients which render its use unsafe. This might have been partially true in the beginning of its manufacture, when skill and experience had not been acquired; but no person of intelligence is now unacquainted with the great perfection to which the article is brought. The best qualities are now produced on the seacoast in Massachusetts, at the salt springs of New York, and at some of the salines of the Western country. They have stood the most rigid tests of analysis, and are found to possess even greater purity than the foreign article. This is just beginning to be understood in the country at large. The domestic salt, at first, like all new productions in any country, was undoubtedly defective. Prejudices existed against it, which required time to remove. The great mass of the people are slow and cautious in changing their pursuits, or the use of any valuable article to which they are accustomed, and in which they have confidence. These prejudices are rapidly giving way in favor of domestic salt; and if the manufacture may be permitted to advance, it will, the committee are fully convinced, obtain a decided preference by all classes of consumers.

It is natural, in a country like the United States, where the people engage in their pursuits with unparalleled activity and ardor, that anxiety should exist to see every object which may be undertaken most rapidly accomplished. The development of skill, as applied to the useful arts, often becomes too tardy for excited hope and expectation; and, unless perfection is obtained at a single effort, apprehensions are felt that it can never be acquired. In other countries, numerous branches of manufactures required centuries to bring them to their present state of improvement. Many of them have been equalled, if not surpassed, in the United States, within twenty or thirty years; others are advancing with a steady pace, and with perfect certainty will be successful, if the Government will adhere to the policy which it has given the most solemn pledges to maintain. The protecting policy is not intended solely for the present day, but to operate during national existence.

The manufacture of salt has been in operation but little more than fifteen years. Its progress has been as great and beneficial as could have been expected. It had never been more productive in quantity, or more improved in quality, than at the time of the passage of the law in question. Preparations were extensively making, in various parts of the country, for a great and continued extension. These have been arrested, and are now waiting the decision of the Government on the application for relief. Upon this will depend renewed exertion, or a general abandonment of the manufacture.

While the committee are of opinion that the passage of the law of the last session was impolitic, much evil may be averted by a repeal of so much as remains to take effect. The manufacture may struggle on and survive. The experiment can be made, under a reliance that the wisdom of Congress will be exercised as any future occasion may require.

The committee, therefore, report a bill to repeal so much of "An act to reduce the duty on salt," passed May 29, 1830, as has not gone into operation.

Memorial of the manufacturers of salt in Kenhawa county, Virginia, praying for a restoration of the duty on imported salt.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The manufacturers of salt in the county of Kenhawa, in the Commonwealth of Virginia, have seen, with the most serious apprehensions and concern, the proceedings had in Congress at its last session, in relation to the protective duty which heretofore sustained and extended the salt business in the United States.

They had not been inattentive to the manifestations of unfriendly feelings towards this branch of American industry; and took early measures, by which they placed before the Government some of the facts and reasons tending, as they thought, to show that the home manufacture of salt could not be given up to a less restrained foreign competition, without eminently endangering the home resources for one of the most important and essential articles of domestic use and public interest; and their memorial, now on the files of Congress, and printed by order of the Senate of the 21st of January, 1828, is most respectfully referred to, and its consideration earnestly solicited.

The duty on salt, as a source of revenue, and as an encouragement to domestic enterprise in its production, is coeval with the Government.

The first Congress which assembled under our present constitution, by an act, approved by the President on the 20th of July, 1789, imposed a duty of six cents per bushel on all salt imported into the States. The same Congress, at their next session, by an act of the 10th August, 1790, increased the duty to twelve cents per bushel.

These enactments laid the foundation for the experiments which were made in the production of salt along our Eastern coast, and added additional stimulus to the researches making in the West for the discovery of supplies of this necessary of life.

The encouragement, however, was not deemed adequate to a sufficiently rapid development of the resources of the country; and, on the 30th September, 1797, Congress augmented the duty on foreign salt to twenty cents per bushel.

The great variety, however, of commercial objects which then attracted the limited capital of the country, left but little for investments in manufactures of any kind; and salt remained among the most languid. Under these circumstances, the experiment was made during Mr. Jefferson's administration, when the resources of the Government were superabundant, and but little capital invested in salt making, of introducing supplies from abroad, without charge; and, by the act of 3d March, 1807, all salt imported into the United States after the 31st of December in that year was declared free of duty.

Happily was it for the interest of the country that this experiment was made! Salt was imported, without impost, from the 1st of January, 1808, until the 1st of January, 1814; and we affirm, without the fear of contradiction, that the article was higher throughout the United States during those six years, than during any period of the same length, from the close of the war of the revolution up to the present time. But this interesting fact will be again adverted to, and more fully examined.

During the late war, the disastrous effects of relying upon others, in time of peace, for an article which enters so essentially into the very existence of civilized society, and the baneful influence that had followed the abandonment of the attempt to bring the resources of a home supply into useful development, and their products to an elevation somewhat commensurate to the national demand, became strongly apparent to all; and, under the liberal and enlarged national policy which then marked the course of the executive and legislative departments of the Government, the duty of twenty cents per bushel on imported salt was renewed, and, by the act of the 20th July, 1813, was reimposed on all salt imported after the 1st of January, 1814. It may not be unworthy of remark, that the same act which renewed this duty, gave the drawbacks and bounties for the encouragement of the fisheries, by which that important source of national wealth, and invaluable school of seamen, has been sustained and preserved to the Union. This act, although rendered temporary by the limitation which it contained, was, in 1816, made permanent.

The close of the long and sanguinary war which had desolated Europe for nearly a quarter of a century, brought into the field of foreign commerce a host of competitors, by which the profits on commercial capital previously employed in foreign trade became greatly lessened, and its owners, seeking for it more secure and advantageous employment, turned their attention to manufactures.

In estimating the safety and security with which such investments might be made, it could not escape the sagacity of the more observing part of the community, that the genius of the Government had steadily and permanently tended to the protection and fostering of our manufactories, particularly such as relieved us from dependence on foreign nations for supplies of commodities of primary necessity.

The earliest operations of Congress had uniformly coupled the encouragement and protection of manufactures with the support of Government, and the discharge of the national debt. General Washington, in December, 1796, had used the following language:

"Congress have repeatedly, and not with success, directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactures. The object is of too much consequence not to ensure a continuance of their efforts, in every way which shall appear eligible. As a general rule, manufactures, on public account, are inexpedient. But where the state of things in a country leaves little hope that certain branches of manufacture will, for a great length of time, obtain, when these are of a nature essential to the furnishing and equipping of the public force in time of war, are not establishments for procuring them on public account, to the extent of the ordinary demand for the public service, recommended by strong considerations of national policy, as an exception to the general rule? Ought our country to remain, in such cases, dependent on foreign supply, precarious, because liable to be interrupted?"

Mr. Jefferson, in 1808, less than two years after the repeal of the salt duty, pressed upon Congress the necessity of protecting duties, as the only means of rendering our manufactures permanent, in the following strong and decisive terms:

"The suspension of our foreign commerce, produced by the injustice of the belligerent Powers, and the consequent losses and sacrifices of our citizens, are subjects of just concern. The situation into which we have thus been forced, has impelled us to apply a portion of our industry and capital to internal manufactures and improvements. The extent of this conversion is daily increasing; and little doubt remains that the establishments formed, and forming, will, under the auspices of cheaper materials and subsistence, the freedom of labor from taxation with us, and of protecting duties and prohibitions, become permanent."

The same gentleman, in 1816, when unconnected with the Government, and indulging in a retired and calm review of the policy of the country, with all that ardent devotion to the liberty, independence, and prosperity of the American people, which so strongly characterized him through life, poured forth his feelings in glowing terms to his friend, as follows:

"We have experienced what we did not then believe, that there exists both profligacy and power enough to exclude us from the field of interchange with other nations; that, to be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them ourselves. We must now place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist. The former question is suppressed, or rather assumes a new form. The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts, or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures, must be for reducing us either to a dependence on that nation, or be clothed in skins, and to live like wild beasts in dens and caverns. I am proud to say I am not one of these."

Mr. Madison's frequent exhortations to protect and foster the several branches of manufacture which had been recently instituted or extended by the laudable exertions of his fellow-citizens, are numerous; and from among them the following are selected:

Extract from Mr. Madison's message of November 29, 1809.

"In a cultivation of the materials, and the extension of useful manufactures, more especially in the general application to household fabrics, we behold a rapid diminution of our dependence on foreign supplies. Nor is it unworthy of reflection, that this revolution in our pursuits and habits is in no slight degree a consequence of those impolitic and arbitrary edicts, by which the contending nations, in endeavoring each of them to obstruct our trade with the other, have so far abridged our means of procuring the productions and manufactures of which our own are now taking the place."

In his message of the 18th February, 1815, he uses the following earnest language:

"There is no subject which can enter with greater force into the deliberations of Congress, than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence, and attained an unparalleled maturity, throughout the United States, during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth I anxiously recommend, therefore, to the prompt and constant guardianship of Congress."

Mr. Monroe, equally devoted to the great interest of the republic, and earnestly desirous of placing the American people beyond the reach of foreign control, as to the necessities and comforts of life, pressed the subject upon Congress in terms the most decisive.

Extract from Mr. Monroe's message of 4th March, 1821.

"It cannot be doubted that the more complete our internal resources, and the less dependent we are on foreign Powers for any national as well as domestic purpose, the greater and more stable will be the public felicity. By the increase of domestic manufactures will the demand for the raw materials at home be increased, and thus will the dependence of the several parts of our Union on each other, and the strength of the Union itself, be proportionably augmented."

Again, in his message of December 2d, 1823, he says:

"Under this impression, I recommended a review of the tariff, for the purpose of affording such additional protection to those articles which we are prepared to manufacture, or which are more immediately connected with the defence and independence of our country."

The uniform views of the Executive branch of our Government did not, however, constitute the only guaranty on which the capitalists relied for the permanent security of their investments in the manufacture of salt. In the year 1818, a committee of the House of Representatives was charged with inquiring into the expediency and propriety of repealing or reducing the duty on salt. After a patient and full examination of the subject in all its relations, that committee, through its chairman, Mr. Lowndes, placed its veto on the proposition, in which the House of Representatives concurred. Mr. Crawford, then at the head of the Treasury Department, was also applied to for his opinion of the policy which the salt duty created and sustained; and his reply to the House of Representatives was decisive of its preservation, so far as the opinion of that distinguished statesman could influence the opinions and policy of the country.

At this period the most sceptical gave up their doubts; the most timid relinquished their fears of an oscillating policy on the part of the Government, in relation to the manufacture of salt. The early and increased protection given to the home production of this indispensable article by the first and fifth Congress; the concurrent opinions of all who had administered the Government, from its foundation upwards, with the exception of Mr. Jefferson's experiment, the history of which furnishes the most obvious security against its repetition; the deliberate determination of the Government, in 1818, to render the country independent of foreign and uncertain supplies, by giving permanent security to the domestic manufacture, induced the most liberal investments in salt making. New sources of supply were sought out: old establishments, organized to meet the pressing and perhaps temporary demands occasioned by the war, underwent extensive renovation, adapting them to permanent use and more economical operations. New establishments grew up in every quarter, until scarce a State in the Union is now without salt furnaces or salt vats!

During the revision of the tariff laws in 1824 and 1828, no serious purpose was manifested from any quarter to reduce or abolish the protection given to domestic salt; so that the previous confidence reposed in the apparently settled policy of the Government annually acquired strength, and led to corresponding expenditures in this branch of business.

This delusive state of security became so universal, that, at the close of the last year, the investments in salt making could not have been less than six millions of dollars; nor could the number of persons in the United States, sustained by this field of industry, have been less than three thousand six hundred, besides their families. Even at the commencement of the last session of Congress, the general indications of security were increased. A motion to inquire into the expediency of a repeal did not meet with the usual courtesy of a reference, but was rejected by a large vote; it was reserved for a period of the most unsuspecting confidence, towards the end of the session, when the policy of almost forty years was suddenly abandoned, and property probably to the amount of six millions of dollars surrendered up to a ruinous competition with foreigners, by the passage of "An act to reduce the duty on salt."

That a measure so disastrous to a large portion of the American people should have been so unexpectedly resolved upon, and so speedily executed, was as much a matter of surprise and of inscrutable mystery, as that, of the long list of protected articles, the one entering into the food and sustenance of every human being in the country should have been singly seized upon, and placed almost without the pale of protection, and the whole community rendered in a great measure dependent upon the precarious and fluctuating resource of foreign supplies.

Among the incidents connected with congressional legislation on this subject, it is a remarkable fact, that no petition from the people has ever reached the legislative hall, complaining of the salt duty either as oppressive or injurious to their interests, and satisfactorily shows the light in which they have regarded this protection, and its tendency to secure them a pure and cheap supply, independent of foreign resources.

That the extent and importance of the salt business in the United States may be in some measure appreciated, and that the number of persons engaged in or dependent on this employment may be more justly estimated, a tabular statement is appended, marked A, principally compiled from the documents accompanying a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, on the 8th of February, 1830, with means of correction and additions derived from an extensive correspondence with gentlemen engaged in the salt business throughout the Union.

From this statement, it appears that salt is manufactured in greater or smaller quantities in two of the Territories, Arkansas and Florida, and twenty out of the twenty-four States. So universal are the resources of domestic salt, that no quarter of the Union is without adequate means of producing it, to any extent which present or future demands may require; and so equally is it placed within the reach of industry and enterprise along the whole coast, and from Ontario to the Sabine, that no protected source of national wealth, except that of iron, is so generally diffused throughout the Union, and so equalizes the burdens (if any should result from the fostering policy hitherto pursued) or the certain and extensive benefits that must follow the general development of this mineral treasure.

The act of the 29th of May, 1830, although levelled at a particular article, and carrying injury to the community only to the extent of its production and consumption, cannot fail to produce apprehensions and alarm in the minds of all who are engaged in the great business of manufacturing.

Iron, which is so extensively consumed in the salt business, as to render it probable that from 125 to 200 tons of malleable, and from 380 to 400 tons of cast metal, are annually required, can scarcely sustain the protection now yielded to it, if these important sources of demand are crippled or destroyed.

The consumption of protected cotton and woollen fabrics, and of sugar, by more than three thousand five hundred persons engaged in salt making, together with their families, must be influenced by their reduced means of purchasing. Agriculture and planting, already employing the labor of the country in excess, must feel the injurious consequences of converting this portion of our people from consumers into producers. And to this act we may safely ascribe the diminution of that confidence which alone induced the enterprise and capital of our country to embark in support of its real independence, by freeing us from reliance on the workshops, the ore banks, and salt mines of Europe.

The abolition of one-half of the duty on foreign salt could not have resulted from any supposed incapacity of the country to produce an adequate supply; for no nation possesses so great a variety of inexhaustible sources. Two thousand miles of coast is washed by a brine yielding a bushel of salt from 350 gallons of water. The saline district of the interior stretches from Lake Onondaga, in New York, to Saline lake, in Louisiana, following in its general course the Appalachian range, and extending to a breadth of upwards of one hundred miles from the western base of this chain of mountains. At various places throughout this vast district, the sources of the salt have been penetrated at great expense, and manufactories commensurate to the extent of population, and the wants of the country, have been carried on with water varying in strength from forty-five to four hundred gallons to the bushel.

On the western border of the great valley of the Mississippi, this important mineral is still more abundant, presenting itself at additional points to almost every explorer of that interesting region. And the Saline lake of Louisiana, the salt springs of Ouachita, those of the Illinois branch of the Arkansas, Boon's salines on the Missouri, Lockhart's on the Lemoyne, the almost saturated brine of the Neosho, and the masses of salt brought from the sources of the Arkansas, of pure quality, strongly attest the value and importance of retaining in the hands of the American people the production of salt for their own use, as well as from the prospect of its forming at some future period an important branch of our national exports.

Formerly, the argument was urged with some plausibility, that the repeal of the salt duty would not affect the manufactories of the interior. It, however, required but a slight examination of the course of the Western trade, the multiplication of steamboats on the Western waters, and the disparity between the ascending and descending cargoes, to produce universal conviction of the destructive effects of such a measure upon the salt business, from the Alleghany to the Rocky Mountains. So obvious has this result become, that a prominent advocate of the repeal has placed his recommendation of the measure on the express ground of supplying the Western States with foreign salt! That no misconception may arise, his words are given. Speaking of the effect of a repeal of the duty, he says:

"The levee at New Orleans would be covered; the warehouses would be crammed with salt; the barter trade would become extensive and universal, if this odious duty was suppressed. A bushel of corn or potatoes, a few pounds of butter, or a few pounds of beef or pork, would purchase a sack of salt; the steamboats would bring it up for a trifle; and all the upper States of the great valley, where salt is so scarce, so dear, and so indispensable for rearing stock and curing provision, in addition to all its various uses, would be cheaply and abundantly supplied with that article."

This argument proceeds upon the ground that a repeal of the duty would cheapen the commodity to the consumer in a degree equivalent to the injury to be inflicted on the manufacturer. It is true, that, so long as the contest for the markets is well sustained by importation and home production, as is the case at present, salt will be afforded throughout the country at its minimum price. It is now brought to the United States almost, if not altogether, as ballast, or to fill that tonnage which would otherwise return home unemployed; but if the conflict is yielded by the American manufacturers, the increased demand for foreign supplies must immediately rise to an amount beyond what can be brought in this way, and consequently it must come charged with the freights and profits of ordinary merchandise, and immediately rise to sixty and eighty cents in our ports, as in 1807.

The present supply of salt in the United States presents the most conclusive evidence that the duty on importations has augmented, not lessened, the quantity in market; and that its redundancy has cheapened the article to the consumer below what a repeal of the duty could have effected. In 1800, when not more than seven hundred and fifty thousand bushels were annually made at home, our importations of salt amounted to 3,441,819 bushels. The total population of the United States then was 5,303,666, which gives about 44 pounds of salt as the yearly consumption of each person. Salt, during that year, under a duty of twenty cents, averaged about sixty cents per bushel at the ports of delivery, and ranged from one dollar to two dollars and fifty cents in the interior. In 1807 and 1808, when salt was imported free of duty, and before the price or the supply was affected by commercial restrictions, its range in the maritime ports was from fifty to one hundred cents, and from one to two dollars in the Western States.

These admonitory facts, contrasted with the present state of supply and price, at once demonstrate the fallacy of looking to a reduction of the duty, rather than to competition in the markets, for the cheapening of this article. We imported last year 5,901,157 bushels, besides the quantity reshipped; and the home manufacture for the same period, according to the information collected by the Secretary of the Treasury, corrected and somewhat enlarged by private correspondence, amounted to 4,444,929 bushels; which, if our population amounts to twelve and a half millions, gives a consumption of 44 pounds to each individual, and leaves a surplus of 524,650 bushels in the hands of the importer and manufacturer, towards the supply of the succeeding year. The effect upon the price or value of any commodity, by introducing a redundancy into the market, is familiar to all, and cannot be more strongly exemplified than in the present instance. In 1807 and 1808, when salt was introduced without tax or duty, but only commensurate to the wants of the country, the price varied at the most favorable points from fifty to one hundred cents. Throughout the year 1829, under a duty of twenty cents, it has averaged, in the principal importing towns, about forty-five cents.

In the Western States, the mean price of salt, in 1807 and 1808, was two dollars per bushel. In 1829, the price, from Pittsburgh to Natchez, and on the principal tributaries of the Mississippi and Ohio, has fluctuated between thirty-seven and a half and seventy-five cents. Yet those who advocate the abolition of the duty proceed upon the ground of cheapening salt to the consumer! and of rendering it more abundant in the interior of the country.

Recent occurrences have, in some measure, tested the accuracy of these conclusions. The Cincinnati and Louisville markets, generally well supplied from the Virginia works, became somewhat bare during the very low water of the past autumn. The price had been steadily kept down to forty-five and fifty cents; but, on the first appearance of a scarcity of Kenhawa salt, the holders of the foreign commodity put it up to seventy-five cents per bushel, and would have continued this exorbitant price, had not the Virginia manufacturers, at more than double the ordinary expense, replenished those markets, and reduced the article to its accustomed rate.

The American duty on imported salt has been likened to the grand gabelle of France, which reduced the consumption of the taxed provinces to nine and one-sixth pounds to each individual; and to the felo de se system of Great Britain, under which about 50,000 tons of taxed salt were consumed by a population of twelve millions, and under which the residue of the demand was supplied by the demoralizing practices of evading the revenue. These hateful taxes were not imposed on foreign supplies only, but were taxes levied on salt produced within those respective kingdoms, advancing the price to the subject, and restraining the manufacturer in the same grievous proportion.

With the tax which was payable at the salt-pans, Napoleon was enabled to complete the grand entrance into Italy, over the Simplon. In England, the duty, amounting to $3 33 per bushel, besides the cost of production, was paid on consumption within the kingdom, while all salt exported to foreign countries was exempted from this burdensome imposition.

The striking dissimilarity of the governmental exactions in France and Great Britain, and in the United States, is manifest. In the two first, it was made the engine of draining from the people most exorbitant sums of money, and of diminishing the amount of the manufacturer's business, in the same ratio; compelling the inhabitants not only to reduce the quantity made and consumed at home to one-fourth of the supply enjoyed by the American people, but for which they were compelled to pay seven times the price, per bushel, which the article commands in the United States. That a system so oppressive and disastrous to the working classes, both of manufacturers and consumers, should have been suffered to exist so long, is our only ground of surprise, except the singular corollary deduced from it by some of our leading statesmen, who infer, that, because England has relieved her people from those odious burdens, the American Government ought to give up her citizens to the rapacity of foreign salters and exporters: because Great Britain has relieved her manufacturers of salt from the most oppressive restraints, Congress ought to withdraw its protecting care from our infant establishments.

The English and French internal duty uniformly and steadily diminished the quantity of salt manufactured within those kingdoms, while the light protecting duty of the United States has as uniformly advanced the home supply.

In 1820, the marshals reported the quantity manufactured in that year at 1,149,725 bushels. In 1827, the quantity manufactured within the United States was, on careful examination of the subject, estimated at 4,113,000 bushels; and, notwithstanding the embarrassing apprehensions which have recently hung over this branch of industry, it will be found that the present annual product of our salt works is not less than 4,444,929 bushels. The duty hitherto paid has effected, as has been shown, a reduction of price to the consumer in every part of the Union: in the West, by placing the foreign and domestic article in such fair competition as to reduce each to its minimum price; in the East, by home production, and by excluding so great a portion of foreign salt from the Western waters, as to leave a large surplus along the whole Atlantic border, by which the price has been there reduced from twenty-five to fifty per cent. below what the commodity commanded in 1807 and 1808, when imported free of duty.

Has the shipping interest suffered by this protective regulation? or has the exorbitancy of the duty lessened importations? From the year 1792 to 1800, inclusive, the average amount of foreign salt received in the United States was 2,769,745 bushels. The quantity imported from 1801 to 1806, inclusive, averaged 3,750,622 bushels. From the commencement of 1807 to the 1st of January, 1814, as no duty was collected, no evidence of the quantity brought in is to be found in the Treasury Department. But, from 1815 to 1820, the progressive increase of importation was manifested, and the average increase of those six years amounted to 4,009,855 bushels per annum. From 1821 to 1826, inclusive, the rate of increase was not preserved, owing, it is presumed, to the rapid multiplication of domestic manufactories; but the mean amount for those six years was but little short of the average of the preceding six, being 3,890,893 bushels.

The removal of the burdensome restrictions from the English salt makers, and the consequent enlargement of their works, so increased the exports from that country, that, in defiance of protection and duties at home, we received, from the 1st of October, 1828, to the 30th of September, in the following year, 5,945,547 bushels of foreign salt; and, from an official statement received from the Treasury Department, it will be found, that, so great was the importation in the last quarter of the year 1829, that, changing the fiscal to the calendar year, the salt received into the United States, in 1829, amounted to the enormous quantity of 6,494,370 bushels.

It is thus seen that the protection heretofore given to domestic salt, so far from diminishing our foreign trade in that article, has been attended with a regular increase; and that our commercial marine has received augmented employment in its transportation, while its carrying trade has diminished in almost every other species of merchandise; and yet it has been the policy of our Government to seize the moment when our manufacture is in its first struggle for existence, and when we are encountering this appalling augmentation of foreign supply, to remove one-half of the protection which mainly brought the salt establishments into existence, and without which they must probably fall before the superior capital and facilities of their foreign competitors.

If it is deemed important that the revenue laws should be modified, with a view to increase the employment of American tonnage engaged in foreign trade, it is humbly submitted whether the experiment can, with justice and propriety be confined to a single article of home production. In following this inquiry, it is by no means intended to question the wisdom and propriety of saving from ruinous competition every branch of manufacturing and productive industry in which we have made encouraging experiments; but, if this rule is not to be preserved in its general and beneficial influence, the inquiry occurs, why is salt selected for sacrifice? Iron, coal, lead, sugar, and a variety of other articles, present themselves, with which our vessels could be more profitably employed than in transporting salt, as these would pay higher freights in proportion to bulk, and which, by their liberal introduction from abroad, would really lighten the burdens which our citizens must encounter in creating and preserving, for a time, any important branch of manufacture. Lead, in bars or sheets, pays a duty of three cents per pound; in shot, five cents; ground in oil, or formed into pipes, the same; which protection, we should suppose, on first view, was scarcely needed by the home producer, who vend it at $2 50 per hundred along the banks of the Mississippi; yet, to guard against an influx disastrous to the owners and workers of lead mines, the foreign article is excluded by a duty amounting to from seventy-seven to one hundred and twenty-five dollars per ton.

Coal pays a duty of six cents per bushel, and iron thirty-seven dollars per ton. If the duty were reduced one-half on these articles of primary necessity, they would furnish more eligible and more profitable freights to our ships returning from Liverpool, and relieve, to a much greater degree, the burdens of taxation so loudly complained of by the advocates of a free importation of salt, and not more seriously affect those engaged in the home supply than the reduction of duty does those engaged in the salt trade.

Sugar, now paying a duty of from three to twelve cents, according to its quality, for the protection and encouragement of our Southern fellow-citizens, and which enters into the daily consumption of every family, by a similar reduction of the duty, and upon the same hypothesis, would have been cheapened to all who use it, and enlarged the employment of American shipping engaged in the West India trade. Had our tariff laws underwent a general modification, upon the principle applied to salt, the increased commerce in these few enumerated articles might alone have essentially diminished the importation of that article, by attracting commercial operations to other commodities within the range of diminution. This view of the subject is presented, rather to show the extreme injury done to one particular branch of domestic industry, than for the purpose of drawing other pursuits into the same vortex.

It is certainly a subject of national felicitation to witness the development of the rich resources of the Mississippi States in coal, sugar, iron, and lead; and no pleasing reflection could attend the contemplation of their palsied efforts and hopeless struggles with unrestrained foreign competition; although such a state of things might, as has been shown, prove less injurious to the manufacturers of salt, than their encountering alone the undivided force of foreign competition.

Among the plausible grounds upon which the salt duty has been assailed, the quality of the American article holds a conspicuous place; and, so far has this prejudice been carried, that the domestic salt is believed to be excluded in preparing provisions for the navy, and perhaps for the army. That the Western salt is sometimes discolored by combinations of ferruginous matter, is familiar to all who use it, and with many it is a mark of recommendation, as it identifies the commodity with what they have long employed, and with the excellence of which they are well acquainted. It may, however, be remarked, that the number of establishments is so great, that various degrees of perfection, in the preparation of salt, necessarily, and, perhaps inevitably exist, and lead to the production of some of inferior quality; but this is the invariable consequence of every branch of business in its earlier stages. Time, competition, increasing experience, and wholesome inspection laws, are rapidly diminishing the production of impure salt, and must shortly banish all of that grade from the markets.

The general character of the Western salt, and particularly that manufactured on the Kenhawa river, will not suffer in comparison with that of Lymington, introduced so extensively into the United States, as the frequent preference given by purchasers to the former abundantly proves. If, however, coarser salt is really necessary for packing salted provisions, it requires but the protecting agency of the Government in favor of its production by solar evaporation to extend the supply to any desirable amount.

The enterprise of individuals has already made extensive progress, in New York, in this species of manufacture, in which the size of crystal and purity of mineral do not suffer in comparison with the best salt of Europe; and, although this expensive mode of production can only be sustained through its infancy by the fixed and permanent policy of the Government, it requires but moderate fostering to become as general as the sources of supply.

Should the exigencies of the country, in the interim, require a relaxation in favor of the coarser salt, it does not follow that the entire manufacture ought to be surrendered; a system of drawbacks, remitting the duty on all salt used in putting up pork, beef, and fish, would remedy the want of that peculiar article, and but slightly affect the general operations of the salt business.

The unexampled exclusion of American salt by the Navy Board, can only be accounted for on the ground that those gentlemen have acted under misrepresentation or misapprehension as to the various qualities of our domestic supply. If the exclusion had been limited to the inferior quality, or to the kinds deemed unfit for packing and preserving barrelled provisions on long voyages, it would have stimulated to the production of the kinds suited to those special purposes; but a sweeping rejection can only operate as a general disparagement of our own salt, and the discouragement of any attempts to meet the wants of the Government.

Duty on Imported Salt.

A review of table G shows us how deeply the English salt makers are interested in the questions under consideration: although salt costs fifty per cent. higher in England than in the West Indies, and notwithstanding her general exclusion of the products of our agriculture, and the excessive burdens she imposes on those of the planting States, we imported from that kingdom, between the 30th of September, 1828, and the 1st of October, 1829, more than one-half of the foreign supply, and from Great Britain and her dependencies, more than two-thirds of the salt received in the United States from abroad.

These facts also demonstrate how much the importation of this article is governed by the course of our foreign commerce, and how little by the price at the place from whence it comes, or the vicinity of the points at which it is produced.

The fact may not be generally known, that salt in England is a drug at the price for which it is sent to the United States; and from which it follows that, as soon as the victory shall be achieved by the importer over the home manufacturer, the price must rise, and the ten cents of duty relinquished here will be a bounty of like amount to the foreign producer; and can it be the policy of the American Government thus to sacrifice her citizens to the aggrandizement of British capitalists, or to destroy from six to seven millions of American property, under the delusive hope of obtaining a cheaper supply of salt? We trust that, before this perilous experiment is made, Congress will reflect that capital in trade, if excluded from one channel, still continues active, and finds employment in another. But that is not so with investments in this business; they are fixed. If the salt establishments are destroyed, the annihilation of the capital is as complete as if buried in the depths of the ocean. If "the cultivation, within ourselves, of the means of national defence and independence" has not lost its value, we yet hope that the fostering hand of Congress will not be withdrawn from this important branch of manufacture. In a war with a maritime nation, it must be principally, if not altogether, relied on. The condition of our country in the two former wars with Great Britain cannot but be recollected; and it must be remembered, that the want of a home supply of salt was felt among the most disastrous results of those struggles. What was found more essential to national defence than this indispensable means of supplying and preserving the food of the army and navy, as well as furnishing the inhabitants with this necessary article of life? What nation can boast of independence, that relies on foreign countries for the primary articles of food? In the language of the distinguished gentleman now at the head of the Government, "it is time that we should become a little more Americanized, and, instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of England, feed our own; or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall all be rendered paupers ourselves." The example of England herself is before us. In the whole history of her political economy, no instance is found of her ever having once adopted a policy for acquiring a manufacture, and afterwards changing it in the slightest degree. The consequence has been, that she has never failed to acquire and establish such manufacture, however unpromising in its commencement; and she has invariably obtained the article manufactured at a cheaper rate, and of better quality, than it could be imported. It is owing to this salutary feature in her policy, more than to any other circumstance, that she now stands unrivalled in her manufactures, in commerce, and in wealth.

Some notice has been taken of a supposed monopoly among the manufacturers of salt in the West, to increase the price of the article to the consumer—a suggestion, as little sustained by the facts, as the hypothesis that a repeal of the duty will not affect the salt makers of that region. A business carried on on almost every tributary of the Ohio, and spread through seven or eight States, is not in its nature susceptible of concerted action or combined operation. So wild a project was never thought of, much less attempted. If the imputation is directed to the manufacturers of salt on the Great Kenhawa, it is equally without foundation. These works have met with animated and almost overwhelming competition in almost all the markets which they have supplied; and, during some years past, a part of the manufacturers, to supply themselves with the means of carrying on their business, and to save themselves from the threatened ruin, contracted with capitalists for the sale of salt which they made. The measure resulted from a want of adequate protection on the part of Government, and the consequent excess of salt introduced into the Western States. This excess beyond the consumption also compelled, at a most serious loss to the trade, the abandonment of many salt wells, which otherwise might have been profitably employed in active business, and has for some years constrained the manufacturers to limit their production, to their very serious disadvantage.

These certainly were not measures of choice, but of stern necessity, which the Government only could have prevented, by securing the home market to the home producer. During those years of difficulty and embarrassment on the part of the manufacturers, they sold their salt at very reduced rates, to meet the exigencies under which they were placed; and if the purchasers availed themselves of their stock on hand to augment the price, (which is not believed to have been the case,) no part of the profits accrued to the salt makers, nor had they any agency in the subsequent sales. They, therefore, cannot but think that wanton injustice alone could seek an excuse for the repeal of the duty in measures which had their origin in the inadequacy of its amount, and in the condition of our foreign commerce. Monopoly on the Kenhawa, with a view to profit, could scarcely find a place in the views of the manufacturers, as, with a very moderate share of sagacity, they would not fail to perceive the effect of such an attempt. Any increase of price beyond what was essential to the carrying on of their business, would operate more effectually as a bounty to the minor works, than as a source of gain to the controlling establishments; so that every increase of price in their commodity would effectually stimulate the production of others, and bring increased supplies, both from home and abroad, into the markets for which they were competitors, by which their sales would inevitably be narrowed, and their business prejudiced.

At present, and for some time past, the salt business has been more methodically conducted. With a view to abridge the expenses which accrue in effecting sales, and for the purpose of securing to every market a more constant and regular supply, an agency or factorage has been effected, which is no less advantageous to the consumer than the manufacturer. The factors, as is usual in such cases, make a small advance upon the salt delivered to their hands, for the twofold purpose of securing the manufacturer, and enabling him to prosecute his operations. The factor is then bound to keep a constant and sufficient supply in all the markets usually frequented, and, after sales have been made, to pay over to each manufacturer, pro rata, the whole proceeds of such sales, subject only to the deductions of the advance payment, the expenses incurred in reaching the markets, and a small commission as a compensation to the agent. Under this arrangement, the manufacturers have the regulation of the price of the commodity, which the active and increasing competition in the West, of a necessity, keeps at its minimum.

This arrangement secures to every market a full supply, and reduces the price to the consumer, by diminishing the expense inseparable from an agency for each establishment, and obviates the inconvenience of individual shipments, by which some markets were overstocked, and others inadequately supplied; but, with all the economy which it introduces into the business of vending the commodity, and with all the improvements in process of preparing the salt, the foreign supply along the Ohio and Mississippi leaves but little hopes of sustaining the competition, without the restoration of the former duty.

The amount of these importations cannot be ascertained with precision, but the aggregate may be approximated by the following known amounts, shipped from Orleans, and received during the fore part of the present year:

	Bushels.
At Nashville, and on the Cumberland, - -	125,000
At Louisville, and above the mouth of Cumberland river, - -	88,000
At Cincinnati, and above Louisville, - -	55,000
At Florence, - -	35,000
At Maysville, - -	5,000
On the Lower Mississippi, and western district of Tennessee, - -	12,000
St. Louis and Upper Mississippi, - -	45,000
Total bushels, -	*365,000

The deep interest which Virginia ought to feel in the preservation of her salt trade, is illustrated by the leading and successful establishments on the Great Kenhawa and on the Holston. The extent of the operations of the first is evidenced by the inspector's returns; and of the latter, by the communications of General Preston and Colonel White. The aggregate quantity being more than sufficient for the entire population of Virginia, at forty-four pounds of salt for each person, and forming a source of wealth and independence to the Commonwealth, unappreciable in the minds of those who examine with care the latent causes of national prosperity and individual happiness.

The amount of property put in jeopardy by the enactment of last winter, from a reasonable estimate, amounts to from six to seven millions, distributed over twenty States. The number of persons employed, from the best evidences which are accessible, are believed to be about three thousand six hundred and fifty-three; and if we may estimate their families as averaging four members, not less than fourteen thousand six hundred and twelve persons are now dependent on the continuance of this branch of industry; and surely no parental Government, charged with the destinies of a nation, can fail to give the most serious consideration to a measure affecting such a mass of property, and involving the happiness and prosperity of so large a portion of its people; or venture upon the consummation of an experiment fraught with such evident danger.

The salt business rivals no one of the great springs of national wealth, while it is auxiliary to some of the highest importance. It does not draw its contributions from what other pursuits might develop, but brings into action the brine of the ocean, and the salt springs fed from the bowels of the earth, which otherwise would remain valueless.

The shock which has been given to this mass of property, and to the employment and resources of so many of our people, is felt throughout the Union, and can only be arrested by the repeal of the obnoxious act. It has not yet commenced its operations; investments have not yet been made with a view to its provisions, and its repeal cannot, therefore, prejudice the interests of any.

Under the liberal patronage of the Government, and with the unlimited resources which are possessed, the salt business must extend itself until it reaches the limit by which every manufacture must be bounded—the ultimate demand on the one side, and the minimum price of a living profit on the other; improving in quality as the lights of science and the aids of experience shall shed their influence over its operations, and, ere long, giving a cheaper and better commodity for the consumption of the American people, than foreign States can supply, as is now measurably illustrated by the Kenhawa works, whose capacity for production is fully adequate to the wants of the whole Western States, should circumstances warrant the exertion of their resources.

But, if once destroyed, the loss is irretrievable. If the modern doctrine of free trade, taught by those whose manufactures are advanced beyond competition, and pressed upon those whose establishments must be annihilated by its adoption, is to mark the course of our Government, the consequence must, in our humble judgments, be the prostration of every manufacture which our people have attempted, and that of salt among the earliest sacrifices. The lessons of experience may come, but they will come too late; for statesmen cannot rebuild by legislation what their laws have destroyed; as all must be aware that when a manufacture is once abandoned by the policy of the Government whose protection gives it existence, or whose fostering care gave it extension, confidence is at an end; and prudent men will not risk their capital when they see it has been lost by a change of opinion which may again occur, and overwhelm them in the ruin of a new experiment.

The earnest consideration which the manufacturers of salt in the county of Kenhawa have given to this subject, satisfies them of the correctness of the facts, and the accuracy of the conclusions which they have urged, and constrains them to address themselves for relief to the wisdom and justice of Congress, with the confident prayer and expectation that the policy indicated by the enactment of the last session will be reviewed and retraced, and the duty on foreign salt restored at least to its former amount. They deem it unnecessary to remonstrate against a further reduction of the impost, because they are satisfied that no state of things can arise, in which the representatives of the people and the States can be induced further and more rapidly to crush the important establishments of the country.

Unanimously concurred in at a numerous meeting of the manufacturers of salt, held, in pursuance of public notice, at Terra Salis, in the county of Kenhawa, on the 22d day of October, 1830; and subscribed for and on their behalf, and by their order.

CURRENT COINS.

IN SENATE, DECEMBER 15, 1830.

Mr. SANFORD, from the select committee appointed to consider the state of the current coins, and to report such amendments of the existing laws concerning coins as may be deemed expedient, made the following report:

The coins now in the United States, and the bank notes now circulating as money, are estimated to amount to about one hundred millions of dollars. The coins are estimated to amount to about twenty-three millions of dollars; of which sum, it is estimated that about fifteen millions of dollars are held by the banks, and about eight millions of dollars are in circulation among the people. The bank notes in circulation are estimated to amount to about seventy-seven millions of dollars. The amount of money in circulation among the people is, accordingly, about eighty-five millions of dollars, consisting of about seventy-seven millions of bank notes and about eight millions of coins.

The sum of fifteen millions of dollars of coins is the estimated average of the coins held by the banks, for several years preceding this time. The banks in the principal seaports have, at this time, an unusual quantity of coins; and the amount of coins now held by those banks is much greater than the sums which they have generally held.

Of the sum of seventy-seven millions of dollars of bank notes in circulation, it is estimated that about one-half consists of notes for sums exceeding five dollars, about one-fourth of notes for five dollars, and about one-fourth of notes for sums less than five dollars. The notes for sums less than five dollars are chiefly for one dollar, two dollars, and three dollars, and a great portion of them consists of notes for one dollar.

The power to establish banks is claimed and exercised by the Government of the United States, and also by each of the States. There are now in the United States about five hundred incorporated banks, and the number is annually increased.

The public revenue of the United States, and of every one of the States, is collected and disbursed almost wholly in bank notes.

The coins held by the banks, and in circulation among the people, are silver. All the coins in common circulation, and most of those held by the banks, are half dollars and the minor silver pieces.

We have no gold coins in circulation.

This country has never determined that either gold or silver should be used as money, in exclusion of the other metal. The constitution of the United States evidently contemplates, in the power conferred upon this Government, to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coins, and the restriction imposed on the States to make nothing but gold and silver coins a tender in payment of debts, that the money of this country shall be gold and silver. Our system of money, established in the year 1792, fully adopts the principle that it is expedient to coin and use both metals as money; and such has always been the opinion of the people of the United States.

The fact that we have no gold coins in use, is not the intended effect of our institutions. It has resulted from too low a valuation of gold in respect to silver when our system was established, and a progressive rise in the relative value of gold since that time. By our system, the two metals are coined upon the basis that one pound of gold is equal in value to fifteen pounds of silver; and all our coinage of the two metals has been executed in conformity to this relative valuation. This proportion was too low a valuation of gold in the year 1792; and it is certainly much too low a valuation of gold, in relation to silver, at this time. Our gold coins, being much underrated in respect to silver, have never had any general circulation in the country; they have ceased to be used as money; they are merely merchandise, purchased by a considerable premium over silver; and they are used in manufactures, or exported to Europe.

Our public coinage of gold is now wholly without any public benefit. We prohibit and punish all private coinage of gold; we coin this metal at the mint, upon a principle which does not permit it to circulate as money; and we pay the expense of this useless coinage. In practice, this coinage affords a facility to the possessor of gold bullion, since it enables him to employ the mint to weigh and assay his bullion, and to divide it into very convenient portions without expense to himself. When the coins are received from the mint, they are sold for their value as bullion; some of them are used in manufactures, and the greater part are exported. If we will not rectify the legal proportion between the coins of the two metals, we ought to abolish the coinage of gold, save a useless expense, and leave gold to be treated like other metals not coined as money.

Each of the two metals is peculiarly convenient for purposes to which the other is not well adapted. Silver is divisible into pieces of small weight and small value, and is convenient for payments of moderate amount, but is very inconvenient when large sums are paid or transported. Gold, containing the greatest value in the smallest compass and weight, cannot be well used in pieces sufficiently small for very small payments, but is eminently convenient for large payments and long transportation. These different advantages cannot be enjoyed without the use of both metals; neither metal can be conveniently used as a measure of value, in the form of bullion; and when only one of the metals is coined, the great convenience of using the other in the form of coins is denied.

If both metals are coined, they must, to render them entirely convenient, be arranged into one system of money; and the value which each metal bears in relation to the other, is the basis upon which the connexion of the two species of coins must rest. But these metals, though far less variable in value than other things, are still subject to variation; and the two species of coins will not circulate together, unless their relative value is very nearly adjusted to the relative market value of the two metals. To secure the use of the two species of coins, the relative value of the two species of metals must be adopted as the relative value of the two species of coins; and, for the same purpose, the relative value of the two species of coins must be changed when any considerable change in the relative value of the two metals takes place. The relative value of gold and silver at any time may be sufficiently ascertained; the two species of coins may be adjusted to that relative value; and such an adjustment will secure the use of the coins of both metals, so long as the relative market value of the two metals shall continue nearly the same with the legal proportion of the coins. When a legal proportion is established, it is impossible to foresee how long the relative market value of the two metals will continue, without material variation; but experience has shown that a suitable adjustment will, in general, secure adequate portions of the two species of coin during a long period.

Minute variations in the relative value of gold and silver occur without end. They result from fluctuations in the demand or the supply of the respective metals; they are, generally, of short duration; and they are, in general, vibrations which compensate each other, and leave the average of relative value unvaried. Such fluctuations very little disturb the concurrent circulation of the two species of coins; and even greater fluctuations may occur, and still leave a sufficient supply of the coins of each metal in circulation. When a disparity in relative value, between the two species of coins and the two metals in bullion, occurs, a premium on the underrated coins follows, and this premium is an inconvenience; but while the premium is small, it may leave an adequate supply of that species of coins. While the coins of either metal may be easily obtained by coins of the other metal, the general utility of the two species of coins is attained; and variations which do not defeat that object are of little moment. This degree of harmony between the coins of the two metals is entirely attainable, and is sufficient for practical convenience. Those considerable and durable variations, which, after a due adjustment of the coins, are sufficient to expel either species of coins from currency, are of slow progress. When they take place, the remedy is, to act again upon the principle which led to preceding adjustments, and to conform the coins to the actual relative value of the two metals.

The necessity of occasional adjustments is a small inconvenience when compared with the great inconvenience of using only one of the metals; and such has been the experience of mankind.

Our money now in use is bank notes and silver. Bank notes are pressed into every channel of circulation; and, though no man is legally bound to receive them, they are generally received. So great is the amount of bank notes in circulation, so widely are these notes diffused through our extensive country, and so much is silver banished from circulation, that the option to demand silver is not within the reach of the great body of the people. The creditor, and especially the poor man, who can neither wait for payment nor go to a bank to demand silver, accepts the bank notes which are offered to him, not because he prefers them to silver, but, in a multitude of cases, because he is in effect constrained to accept them or nothing. One of many causes which swell this torrent, and impose upon the people a species of necessity to use paper money, is the want of gold coins.

Gold and silver have intrinsic value in all times and all circumstances; and coins of these metals are money in all the exigencies of men and societies. Credit is a substitute for money; but it is a substitute dependent upon local and temporary opinion and the casualties of human affairs, and is liable to great abuses. The coins should be such, that when credit is substituted for gold and silver, either of these metals may still be used by all who do not choose to give credit; and still more is it necessary, when credit is impaired or destroyed, that gold and silver should readily take its place. Whether a country has paper money or not, the system of coins should be the same. All paper money consists in promises to pay coins; and the coins for which promises are issued, should be such as sound principles require where no paper money exists.

Bank notes are frequently received in preference to silver, when gold coins would be more convenient or desirable than bank notes. In such cases, gold would be used if it could be procured; and it should be attainable. To refuse to coin gold for the sake of paper money, or because paper money occupies a place which gold would fill, would be a mischievous error. A bad state of the coins is a great evil; but when such a state of the coins is continued, for the purpose of promoting the use of paper money, the end is pernicious, and the means are an abuse of power. Our banks have the right to pay their notes in silver; and they ought not also to enjoy the advantage of an entire banishment of gold coins from the United States. There will surely be sufficient scope for the circulation of bank notes, when the coins which they do not expel from use shall consist partly of both metals: and if it is the interest of the banks that we should have no gold coins, the public interest of the country is, that we should have coins of gold as well as coins of silver.

If the slow and gradual variations which take place in the values of gold and silver, are an objection to the use of both these metals as money, far greater is the objection to paper money issued in such quantities as must necessarily produce great fluctuations. Strange, indeed, must be that policy which can tolerate five hundred different kinds of paper money, and cannot tolerate both gold and silver; which cannot endure the instability of the precious metals, and can submit to the great derangement of values produced by excessive and fluctuating issues of bank notes.

The power to coin money and regulate its value, resides exclusively in the Government of the United States. Our paper money is issued by a multitude of banks established by different authorities, and under no common control; and when we do not suffer the evil, we are constantly exposed to the danger of excessive issues of bank notes. Where the circulating coins are both gold and silver, paper money is less used than it is where all the coins are of silver; and the currency of gold coins in our country will tend to repress this constant tendency to excess of paper money. So far as the use of gold coins in addition to silver may counteract this excess, the effect will be beneficial. If all our banks were under the control of one Government, the use of gold, as well as silver, in coins, would be a most salutary check upon excessive issues. In the actual state of our paper money, it is much more necessary that this check should exist and operate; and the first step to this object is the due exercise of the power to coin gold and silver. The coinage of both these metals is not only dictated by the sense of the constitution and the soundest principles of public economy, but is also required by the condition of our paper money: and this measure entrusted solely to this Government, is one of its high duties to the country.

Whether, therefore, we consider this question upon principles which should prevail in all times and all countries, or in reference to the peculiarities of our own condition, it is expedient that we should coin and use gold as well as silver.

While we have so much paper money, we cannot have any great quantity of the precious metals in use, as money; and while this extensive use of paper money shall continue, an adjustment of the relative value of gold and silver will not bring much gold into circulation. Still, the necessary adjustment should be made. No man can foresee how far the present course of issuing paper money will proceed, or how long paper money in its present forms and abundance will be tolerated. Whatever may happen in respect to paper money, the precious metals should always be coined, and a sound system of coins should be in constant operation, to the end that whether paper money should be used or not, and whether the amount of our coins shall be great or small, a portion of them may consist of gold, and another portion of silver.

By a resolution of the Senate, of the 29th day of December, 1828, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to ascertain, with as much accuracy as possible, the proportional value of gold and silver in relation to each other; and to state such alterations in the gold coins of the United States, as may be necessary to conform those coins to the silver coins, in true relative value. On the 4th day of May last, the Secretary made a report to the Senate. This very able report presents a mass of facts and statements which are highly important; and among the papers annexed to it, is a letter from Mr. Gallatin, which is inestimable, for sound and just views of the use of gold and silver as money.

By our system, the expense of coining both gold and silver is defrayed by the Government; and the coins themselves are not subjected to any charge. He who brings gold or silver to the mint to be coined, receives, in return, the same quantity of pure metal in coins which he delivers to the mint in bullion. The proportional value of the two metals in our coins should, therefore, be the relative intrinsic value of pure gold and pure silver.

It has been suggested that it may be expedient to coin our gold in a ratio to silver of one or two per centum less than the relative market value of gold to silver; but this idea is inadmissible. The end of coining the two metals is, that they may circulate together; that every person who has coins of either silver or gold, may easily exchange them for coins of the other metal; and that the people may enjoy the advantage of using either species of coins, according to convenience or pleasure. To attain this end, the two metals must bear the same relative value in coins which they bear as bullion. Where gold bullion and silver bullion are wanted, they are supplied in suitable proportions, according to the demand for each metal; and where gold coins and silver coins are adjusted in value to the relative market value of the two metals, the due portions of the two species of coins are determined by convenience and utility. A legal proportion different from the relative market value of the two metals, banishes the coins of the underrated metal from circulation, or confines them to partial use, with a premium over the coins of the other metal, and, therefore, either defeats the object of a legal proportion, or abridges its benefits. If it is expedient that both metals should be used in coins, both species of coins should, circulate freely, and without the embarrassment of purchasing one by a premium upon the other; and neither of them should be, more than the other, a subject of traffic. No legal advantage should be given to either metal, in the relative valuation of the two metals in the coins: and our legal proportion should be the true relative value of gold and silver in the United States.

The relative value of gold and silver is found in the prices which these metals bear when they purchase each other; and an average of a great number of prices, during a considerable period, is regarded as the relative value of the two metals, for the purpose of adjusting the proportional value of the two species of coins.

Statements of the prices of gold in this country are annexed to Mr. Ingham's report; and many others have been obtained. A mere average of all the prices which appear in the statements, would not deserve reliance as a true expression of the relative value of the two metals, for the purpose of an adjustment: and all such statements must be examined with great circumspection and attention to many circumstances, in order to deduce from them satisfactory evidence of the relative value of the two metals in the United States.

Our gold coins, the gold coins of other countries, and gold in bullion, are all sold and bought as bullion. The prices paid for our gold coins are expressed very simply, by the premiums on the nominal value of those coins. Gold bullion and foreign gold coins fluctuate somewhat more than our own gold coins; but the prices of all of them are in general nearly the same: and the prices of gold in all its forms may be considered as expressed by the rates of premium on our gold coins. An examination of these premiums will, therefore, sufficiently comprehend the prices of all gold in this country.

The premiums paid for our gold coins have varied much at different times; the lowest premium having been one per centum, and the highest six and three-fourths per centum. These are the limits of fluctuation, according to the statements; but it is ascertained that in some few instances the premium paid has been seven per centum.

Our gold coins are considered to be one-half of one per centum defective in weight and standard; and this allowance is made in connexion with the premiums, in the calculations which follow.

Our supply of gold from foreign countries is constant; and the domestic supply from the Southern States is now considerable. The demand for gold in this country is for manufactures and for exportation. A very considerable quantity is used in manufactures, and the demand for gold for this purpose is very steady; but the quantity used in manufactures is far less than the quantity exported. The chief demand for gold is for exportation; and this demand is sometimes great, and at other times it entirely ceases. Hence result great fluctuations in the prices of gold in this country.

One principal reason of these great fluctuations in the prices of gold, is, that we do not use gold as money. Bullion fluctuates more than coins; but where either of the precious metals is used as money, the demand for coins tends strongly to give stability to the value of that metal, both in coins and in bullion. If there were a steady internal demand for gold coins as money, in addition to the demands for manufactures and for exportation, there would be far more stability in the prices of gold in this country.

Another cause of these fluctuations exists in fluctuations of the medium by which gold is purchased. Our money in use is silver and bank notes; far the greater part in bank notes; and the amount of bank notes in circulation is sometimes greatly increased, and at other times greatly reduced. These fluctuations of the amount of circulating money raise or reduce the prices of gold as they affect all other prices.

The great demand for gold is for exportation to Europe, and especially to England; and this demand, much more than any other, governs the prices of gold in the United States. When gold is not wanted for exportation to England, all other demand for it is so small, that it falls in price considerably below the general average of its value; and, excepting the ordinary demand for manufactures, little is bought or sold, until the course of commerce again produces a demand for gold for exportation. The prices of gold are, therefore, governed, to a great extent, by the current rates of exchange on England; gold rising in price as these rates of exchange rise, and falling as they fall. When exchange on England is low, gold is so little in demand, that it evidently falls much below the general relative value which gold bears to silver, either in this country or in Europe. When the rates of exchange on England are low, the prices of gold follow the prices of bills, and not the price of silver: and when the remittances are made partly in bills and partly in gold, the price of gold is still determined by the rates of exchange. When exchange and gold both rise to such rates, that silver is exported to England, the two metals are placed against each other in active use, and gold receives its valuation in respect to silver from the two demands for manufactures and exportation.

We have thus different states of prices of gold; one when neither of the precious metals is exported; another when gold is exported, and silver is not exported; and another when both the metals are exported.

The relative valuation of the two metals in the coins should be such that neither species of coins will be exported in preference to the other. If the two metals are valued in the coins at such a rate, in comparison with each other, that one species of coins is exported while the other remains, the object of an adjustment is not attained. The existing evil for which we seek a remedy, is, that our gold coins being underrated in respect to our silver coins, do not circulate, and are exported. The lower prices of our gold when it is used only in manufactures, do not express the relative value of gold and silver, which will render the coins of both metals equally subject to exportation. An average of all the premiums on our gold taken, without discrimination, is three and seven-eighths per centum: and we know with certainty that gold is exported to England in preference to silver, and with more profit, until the prices of gold rise to a much higher premium.

We cannot have the use of gold coins while it is more profitable to export them than to export silver: and it is impossible to retain gold coins in the country, unless their legal value in relation to silver is such, that when one metal or the other, or both, must be exported, there shall be no profit in exporting gold rather than silver.

Our coins of both metals are intended for domestic circulation; and the relative valuation of gold and silver which will ensure this object, cannot be found either in the prices of gold, which occur when neither of the two metals is exported, or in the prices which prevail when gold is exported and silver is not exported. The relative valuation which will ensure the concurrent circulation of the two species of coins, must be found in the prices which the two metals bear when both are exported: and our average for the purpose of an adjustment must be drawn from the prices which prevail when both metals are exported, or are in demand for exportation.

The prices of gold exhibited in the statements of current prices, are prices actually paid when there are sales, and estimated rates when there is no sale. These statements do not show the number of sales, or the quantity sold at any time; nor do they discriminate between actual prices and estimated values. If the different sales of gold, and the quantities sold at different times, were stated, and if actual prices were distinguished from estimated values, it would appear that when the premium on our gold is high, large quantities of this metal are sold and purchased; and when the premium is low, the quantity bought and sold is small; and that when there is no sale, the prices stated are estimates founded in most cases upon the lower prices of gold. When these facts are disregarded, and an equation is drawn from all the rates of premium stated for a long period, it produces too low a valuation of gold: and reliance for a just average must be placed upon those prices for which the greater part of this merchandise is bought and sold, rather than upon those lower prices which are either nominal, or real only when gold is not exported from the United States.

At this time, the premium on our gold coins does not exceed two per centum: and, according to this premium, the value of gold in respect to silver would be 15.375 to 1. Yet the relative value of gold is now unquestionably much higher than this ratio, both in America and Europe. Exchange on England is now low: the only demand for gold is for manufactures; and the supply much exceeds the demand for this object. This very low premium, resulting from low rates of exchange on England, is for the time a real price of gold; but it is certainly not that price which will place the two metals in such relative valuation, that when a demand for exportation shall arrive, either gold or silver may be exported with equal profit.

Silver is not exported to Europe, until exchange on England rises to about nine and a half per centum of nominal premium: and when exchange on England is at this rate, the premiums on our gold appear to be very seldom less than five per centum, and generally at higher rates. Though, when bills on England are at nine and a half per centum of nominal premium, silver begins to be exported, yet little is then exported; and it appears certain that silver is not exported equally with gold, until bills on England rise to ten and a half or eleven per centum of nominal premium. When exchange on England is at ten and a half per centum of nominal premium, the premiums on our gold appear to be very seldom less than five and a half per centum, and generally at higher rates.

An average of the premiums on our gold, of five per centum, and higher rates, not exceeding six and three-fourths per centum, is five and seven-eighths per centum. But as the premium has seldom risen to six and three-fourths per centum, and most of the sales of gold for exportation have been made for premiums between four and a half and six and a half per centum, the average of the higher premiums may rather be estimated at five and a half per centum.

The table E, subjoined to Mr. Gallatin's letter, is a statement of the rates of exchange on England, and the premiums on our gold coins, for each month of a period of four years and a half, commencing with January, 1825, and ending with June, 1829. Mr. Gallatin states that the average premium on our gold coins for the whole of that period has been about five and one-sixth per centum on their nominal value; and he estimates the ratio of gold to silver, deduced from this rate of premium, to be 15.82 to 1.

If we select any particular period for an average of premiums, the period stated in the table E, being recent and of considerable length, is very proper for that purpose; but, during other considerable periods, the premiums on our gold and the rates of exchange on England have been much lower than they were from January, 1825, to June, 1829. Whether we take the premiums of one period or those of another, the relative value of gold and silver which will secure the circulation of both metals in coins, must be found in the premiums which prevail when both silver and gold are exported.

To avoid the inaccuracy which may exist in compiled statements and estimated rates, a great number of prices on actual sales of gold in the city of New York have been obtained; and many of these sales took place during the period from the first day of January, 1825, to the last day of June, 1829. An average of all the premiums on our gold paid on these actual sales during that period is 5.58 per centum. The relative value of gold and silver resulting from this rate of premium is 15.912 to 1.

When all these facts and circumstances are duly estimated, the conclusion is, that, for the purpose of an adjustment which shall place the coins of the two metals in such relation to each other, that both may circulate in the United States, our average must be drawn from the premiums on our gold, higher than about four and a half or four and three-fourths per centum; and that the average of this higher class of premiums is about five and a half per centum. This is the lowest average which can be deduced from those prices of gold which prevail in this country, when both gold and silver receive their valuations from demand for internal use and demand for exportation to Europe. According to this average price of gold, the relative value of gold and silver in our coins should be 15.9 to 1.

In France, the relative value of gold to silver is about 12.82 to 1.

In Great Britain, gold is in value to silver about as 15.86 to 1.

The relative value of gold and silver in Spain has been 16 to 1 during the last fifty or sixty years; and, according to recent information, the value of gold in Spain is now a little higher than this proportion.

In Portugal, the rise of gold and the decline of silver in relative value were slower and later than in Spain: but the relative value of the two metals in Portugal is now about 16 to 1, and this proportion appears to have prevailed there for many years.

The relative value of gold and silver in the American countries south of the United States is a fact of great importance in this inquiry. In countries which produce one or both of the precious metals in considerable quantities, the supply from the mines fluctuates; these fluctuations are sometimes great; and an extraordinary supply, or an unusual failure of either metal, affects the relative value of the two metals. In most of the American countries which contain rich mines of these metals, the values of gold and silver have been, during many years, disturbed by war, civil commotions, and arbitrary regulations, concerning the mines and commerce in these metals. These circumstances render it difficult to obtain exact information concerning the relative value of the two metals in those countries; but though this relative value cannot be ascertained with accuracy, it may still be discovered, so far as to leave little uncertainty.

From the information which can be obtained, it appears that the value of gold in relation to silver is about 16 to 1 in all the American countries south of the United States. This relative value seems to have prevailed in those parts of America which were formerly Spanish, and especially in Mexico and Peru, during the last forty or fifty years. In Brazil, gold was, for a long time, somewhat less valuable; but, during the last ten years, the relative value of the two metals in Brazil has also been about 16 to 1. In the West Indies, the two metals fluctuate much, in respect to each other; but the ratio of 16 to 1 seems to be the average of relative value.

The relative value of gold and silver in this country must depend principally upon their relative value in the countries from which we receive these metals, and their relative value in the countries to which we send them; and their relative value here must be determined as much by the prices for which we buy gold and silver, as by the prices for which we sell these metals. When we deduce the relative value of gold and silver in this country from relative values existing in other countries, we must resort as well to the countries from which these metals are imported, as to the countries to which they are exported; and our conclusion must be drawn from both sources.

In the ordinary course of foreign commerce, our supply of gold and silver is received chiefly from the American countries south of the United States. More than one-third of the whole is now received from Mexico. We export gold and silver to Great Britain, silver to France, some silver to China and the south of Asia, and some gold and silver to other countries. Our exports of silver to China were formerly great, and are now small. During the year ending on the 30th day of September, 1828, the amount of our exports of silver to India and China was less than one million seven hundred thousand dollars; and for the year ending on the 30th day of September, 1829, our exports of silver to the same countries did not amount to one million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Far the greater part of all the gold and silver exported from this country is sent to Europe.

If we take the relative value of gold and silver in the American countries from which we receive these metals to be 16 to 1, and the average of the relative value of the two metals in all Europe to be 15.85 to 1, the medium between these valuations is 15.925 to 1; and this ratio coincides very nearly with the proportion deduced from those actual prices which prevail in this country, when both silver and gold are exported to Europe.

The Government of the Netherlands has recently adjusted the relative value of the two metals in the coins of that country, and has established the proportion between gold and silver at 15.875 to 1; but the details which may attend this regulation, in respect to charges for coinage or other particulars, are not known.

By the regulations of Spain, the proportional value of gold and silver at the mint is 16 to 1, and has been so since the year 1779. There is, probably, a seigniorage on the coinage of these metals at the mint: but the Spanish regulations in this respect are not accurately known. It is certain that in Spain the coins of the two metals circulate together; that silver is much more abundant than gold; and that the gold coins usually bear a small premium over the coins of silver.

The regulation concerning the relative value of the two metals in the coins, established by Spain in 1779, was at the same time extended to all the mints in Spanish America; and since that time gold and silver have been coined by all the mints under the power of Spain, in conformity to that regulation.

Since the American countries, formerly Spanish, and now independent, have established their own mints, they have observed the same regulation; and their coinage of the two metals is according to the value of 16 to 1.

The proportion between gold and silver in the Portuguese coins of the two metals is 16 to 1, and has been so since the year 1820. In Portugal, the coins of both metals circulate together; but much the greater part of the circulating coins is silver.

In Brazil, the proportional value of gold and silver at the mint is 16 to 1.

Thus, according to all the information which can be obtained, a pound of gold is now worth sixteen pounds of silver in all America south of the United States, and in Spain and Portugal; and, in all these countries, this relative value has been adopted as the proportional value of the two metals in the coins. Though, in some of these countries, this proportion may be varied in effect, by charges on coinage; and, in some of them, the coins deviate from this proportion, in the weight or fineness of the coins of one or the other metal; yet the Governments of all these countries have, evidently, considered the relative value of gold and silver to be 16 to 1: and the concurrent circulation of the coins of the two metals in these countries has well justified that opinion.

So far as the relative value of gold and silver in this country is uncertain, there are reasons of great weight, which should induce us to assign a high valuation to gold in relation to silver.

The labor of counting or weighing the coins which may be necessary for a remittance to a foreign country, is less in the case of gold than in the case of silver; and where all other circumstances are equal, this reason alone produces the exportation of gold rather than silver.

When the relative value of the two species of coins accords exactly with the relative market value of the two metals, gold coins are exported in preference to silver coins; the risk and expense of exportation being greater in the case of silver than in the case of gold.

When gold and silver sent to Europe, and especially to England, have arrived, gold is in general converted into the money of the country, or available funds, somewhat sooner than silver; and gold is, for this reason, a better remittance.

Gold is rising in value, in relation to silver. During the last three hundred years, gold has, with some temporary exceptions, been gradually advancing in value: during the last twenty years, the enhancement of gold in respect to silver has been quite as great as it had ever before been during any equal period; and gold still continues to rise. The immense power of machinery which has been brought into use in our own time, is fully applicable, and is now applied, to mines of silver; and the quantity of silver extracted from the earth has, from this cause, been already greatly increased. The quantity of gold obtained from the earth has not been much increased by any recent improvement of art. The present progress of change certainly is, to raise gold and depreciate silver, in respect to each other; and it is highly probable that gold will continue to rise, and silver to fall, in the future course of their relative value.

If our gold coins should circulate to any considerable extent, the demand for gold for coinage would in some degree enhance the value of that metal in relation to silver in this country.

Gold is, more than silver, banished from use by paper money: and our gold coins, in order to circulate, must be able to contend not only with the demand for gold to be sent abroad, but also with the expelling influence of paper money at home.

If we should underrate our gold coins, they will have no general circulation. They will be used in manufactures, or will flow through the established channels of commerce as they now flow, almost directly from the mint in Philadelphia to Europe. If we should slightly overrate gold, we shall secure the use of gold coins; and we may lose some silver, but the loss of our silver coins even then would not follow to an inconvenient extent. Almost all our silver coins are half dollars and the minor parts of the dollar. These coins are indispensable in their proper sphere of circulation: their place cannot be filled either by gold or bank notes; and these coins are not often exported. We have a steady supply of silver in bullion; and the mint is now able to coin any necessary or desirable quantity of either or both of the precious metals. An adjustment of the relative value of the two species of coins with as much accuracy as may be practicable, must bring some gold coins into circulation; and the gold brought into currency may in some degree displace the silver coins; but it will, in a much greater degree, take the place of bank notes.

The general course of our exchanges with Europe is against us; and when remittances cannot be advantageously made by bills, gold is sent to Europe, and especially to Great Britain, so long as gold is not evidently too dear in this country, in comparison with silver. For this purpose, gold, other circumstances being equal, is much preferred to silver; and gold rises to its highest value in relation to silver, before silver is exported. This established current of commerce, in which gold is a customary and favorite remittance, tends to maintain this metal at a high value, in relation to silver. Still, this current is not constant; and when gold is not in demand for exportation, its price in silver falls: But in order that both gold and silver should circulate as money, it is necessary that demands for exportation should fall upon both metals; that when a demand for exportation occurs, it should in general be as profitable to export one of them as the other; and the relative valuation which will ensure this object, is that which exists when both metals are or may be exported with equal profit.

These considerations are submitted, not to recommend any deviation whatever from the true relative value of the two metals in this country, so far as that value is an ascertained fact; but to show, that so far as the relative value of gold and silver is uncertain, we may safely assign a high valuation to gold, within the limits of that uncertainty.

The ratio of sixteen to one is recommended by some considerations which deserve attention. Though Mr. Ingham proposes a lower valuation of gold, he is of opinion that the ratio of sixteen to one is necessary to render gold and silver equally attainable in the United States. Mr. White is also of opinion that no valuation of gold, less in respect to silver than sixteen to one, would effectually retain our gold coins in use. Spain, Portugal, and all the American countries which have mints, excepting these United States, have established the proportion of sixteen to one as the basis of their coinage; and if we should adopt the same proportion, one uniform rule would prevail in all the independent countries in America. Much more of the two metals is now coined, upon the basis that gold is in value to silver as sixteen to one, than according to any other proportion. If it is expedient to conform our ratio to the existing proportion of any other country, it must be expedient to adopt that proportion which prevails most widely, and the ratio of sixteen to one is now far the most extensive example. A rule so extensive is entitled to respect; but the practical operation of the rule is much more instructive; since it shows that this relative valuation of the two metals secures their concurrent circulation in coins in a very large part of the world.

But our adjustment must be founded on the relative value of gold and silver in our own country; and the ratio of sixteen to one is a valuation of gold somewhat too high in the United States.

Upon all the facts before us, the ratio of 15.9 to 1 appears the most eligible. This proportion assigns to gold the average of value which gold bears to silver, when both metals are in demand, for exportation: and it seems more likely than any other ratio to attain and reconcile the objects of a proportional valuation. It is accordingly recommended as the relative valuation most proper to be established in our coins of the two metals.

Various other ratios have been suggested; but any proportion by which gold shall be estimated less in respect to silver than 15.9 to 1, will, it is believed, be altogether insufficient to ensure the circulation of gold coins in this country.

Still, it will be better to adopt any of the lower valuations of gold which have been proposed, than to continue our coinage of this metal according to the existing legal proportion.

The relative value of gold and silver can never be stated with infallible accuracy; but the entire certainty which is unattainable, is not necessary for the purpose of establishing a proportional value between the coins of the two metals. A near approach to the relative market value of the two metals is sufficient for this practical object. When the relative value of gold and silver in any country is examined with the greatest care, different results are obtained by different persons; and no adjustment can ever be made, without encountering this apparent difficulty. In our own case, the difficulty of ascertaining the true proportion is increased by great fluctuations in the prices of gold; and it was to be expected that various opinions concerning the relative value of the two metals in this country should appear. The variety of opinions and propositions respecting the ratio proper to be established in our coins, should not deter us from an amendment of the existing proportion. The difficulty of ascertaining the true relation of value between gold and silver in this country, which now exists, will continue to exist until we shall use both gold and silver as money; and if a new adjustment should not be entirely correct, it will, by its operation, at least, lay a foundation for a more accurate valuation. The opinions which have been expressed by others, the opinions now submitted, and the facts and reasons by which all the different opinions are supported, are now before the Senate; and, from these materials, the proportion which shall be deemed most eligible, may be selected.

A bill is submitted, which, leaving the silver coins unaltered, proposes that our gold coins shall contain the quantities of metal which result from the relative valuation of 15.9 to 1. The weight of an eagle, according to this relative valuation, will be 233 26.53 grains of pure gold, and 254 38.53 grains of standard gold: and a table is subjoined to this report, by which the weights of an eagle resulting from various other proportions are exhibited.

SILVER COINS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 22, 1831.

MR. WHITE, of New York, from the select committee to whom was referred a resolution of this House, of the 23d December, 1830, directing them "to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that dollars of the new American Governments, and five franc pieces, shall be a legal tender in the payment of all debts and demands; and, also, whether any additional regulations are necessary relative to the recoinage of foreign silver coin at the mint," reported:

That the authority "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin," is one of the powers specially and exclusively granted to Congress by the constitution of the United States; and, in the exercise of this appendage of sovereignty, various regulations have been enacted in regard to foreign coins and coinage.

The constitutional expression clearly justifies the inference that foreign coins were current money, and that their adjustment and retention in circulation were desired by the people of the United States. A brief consideration of the usages of other States, and a minute inquiry into our own practice and present circumstances, will be useful guides in the progress towards just conclusions.

Although national coins are usually and appropriately the metallic currency of the commercial world, yet some States have risen to the highest rank in commerce and general prosperity without adopting the principle of a standard of value exclusively in their own coins. England and France have maintained the exclusive system; but Holland, Hamburg, Genoa, China, and the United States, have, more or less, freely received the coins of well known mints at their intrinsic value. Peculiarity of circumstances may have induced or recommended this diversity of regulations, but there is not any evidence in the historical result, that the exclusive system was particularly beneficial, or that the free reception of foreign coins was inconvenient in practice, or prejudicial in its effects. Our own experience corroborates the latter view.

France is an imposing instance of great national prosperity under a rigid and persevering adherence to its own coins; still, it is not perceived that the reception of foreign coins, at their intrinsic value, with their use restricted to large commercial transactions, could have operated otherwise than beneficially. The profit upon money transactions depends materially upon its prompt and easy disbursement; and its being undervalued at the mint, as is the case in France, amounts to a tax and restraint upon its importation, and, to that extent, it diminishes or prejudices exchanges.

During the progress of Holland to pre-eminence in trade and wealth, (and until very recently,) the introduction of foreign coins was uniformly encouraged. Money was coined for small domestic purposes, but every description of gold and silver coins was received at the bank according to its real value, and there assimilated to the commercial currency, under the general title of "Banco." Genoa at an early period, and Hamburg to this day, have, with great advantage, practised a similar system of mercantile accommodation, except that the deposits in the bank of the latter city have always been restricted to silver. It is alleged that the money of commerce in China is foreign coins converted into gold and silver ingots of certain fineness.

The monetary system of England is comparatively modern, and it is peculiar to that nation. Except the late period of war, their regulations, for more than a century, established in practice the principle, now in legal operation, of a single standard in gold, but a mixed currency. Bank notes, at one time not less than £20 sterling, afterwards £10, and now £5, redeemable, on demand, in gold, are issued and used as the chief circulating medium for discharging commercial or other large obligations. But it is contemplated that all minor transactions, retail business, wages of labor, &c. should be paid in gold, unless under the value of forty-two shillings, when it is optional to use silver coins. Under this arrangement, it is computed that the currency of England is composed of thirty millions of pounds sterling in paper, twenty-two millions of gold, and eight millions of silver; one-half of the entire circulation being metallic. Foreign coins are not a legal tender, but gold, in every shape, is current, at a trivial discount, (one-sixth of a per cent. at present,) or occasionally at the mint value, coinage being free. Silver is there a commodity, varying in price with the foreign exchanges; a seignorage of six per cent. being exacted at the mint, its coinage becomes a Government business, and the supply is regulated by the amount of effective demand.

This limited use of silver rather tends to depress its market value, the more especially as this metal, which England rejects, is, generally speaking, the practical currency and money of the commercial world. The British nation, nevertheless, contend, that this inconvenience is amply compensated by the steady preservation of the value of the money unit, and the retention of the customary coins permanently in circulation.

Our own practice, in regard to gold and silver money, has differed materially from the usage of any of the nations adverted to; and, as custom has an important influence in establishing predilections, a minute and accurate inquiry on this head may prove advantageous and instructive.

Foreign gold and silver coins were the only description of metallic currency that circulated in these States anterior to 1792. In that year, Congress authorized the erection of a mint, regulated the proportions of gold to silver, and established a relative value in all foreign coins then current, according to their intrinsic worth—rendering them concurrent tenders in payments, in conformity with the language of the constitution, which distinctly intimated the necessity and utility of their circulation.

Although gold and silver coins have both been used and regulated by law, yet it is believed that silver coins alone were legally recognised during our colonial history. Whatever may have been the case in this respect, there can be no doubt but a "Spanish dollar" was originally the practical money unit; and if obligations have been discharged with gold and with paper, as well as silver, a certain number of Spanish dollars have, at all times, constituted, specially, or by implication, the basis of exchange and the measure of the contract.

Our money of account was originally an ideal unit, called a pound; but it is very evident that the Spanish dollar was universally current, from the fact, that, although its value varied in the colonies from 4s. 8d. to 8s. currency each, it was uniformly estimated, in computations of exchange with England, at 4s. 6d. sterling. The universality of that estimate is presumptive evidence that the Spanish dollar was the practical currency of the colonies; and our adherence to a mode of calculation so obviously erroneous exhibits such pertinacity as will only attach to old and well-founded habits; but the nature of the estimate proves, incontrovertibly, the antiquity of its practice. Spanish dollars of that value ceased to circulate by tale in 1728. From the reign of Philip III of Spain, until that time, the standard fineness of silver was 11 1-6 dinhios fine; therefore, the marc of Castile, 3,557 grains, must have yielded 8½ dollars, containing 389 4-10 grains; but the remedy then being (two grains fine) nearly three grains each, the value of dollars, antecedent to that period, was, likely, from 386½ to 387½ grains of fine silver. According to the British standard, established in 1601, 444 grains of fine silver being rated at 5s. 2d. sterling, 4s. 6d. were represented by 386 7-10 grains, equivalent to the average value of the Spanish dollar, as above stated, in circulation previous to 1728.

Sir Isaac Newton's return of assays, made by order of the British Government earlier than 1717, contains this statement:

	Dwts.	Grains.	Eng. standard.		Value sterling.	Grains fine silver.
			Dwts.	Grains.
Dollar of Spain,	17	12	17	10 1-10	4 6 7	386 3-4
Dollar of Mexico,	17	10 5-9	17	8 7-10	4 5 5-6	385 1-2
Pillar dollar,	17	9	17	9	4 5 7-8	385 3-4

And Ricard, in his "Traité General du Commerce," asserts that it was rare to see in the British American provinces any English coins, but that the following foreign silver coins were made legal tenders in payment, by an act of Parliament, passed during the reign of Queen Anne, in 1706, viz. German rix dollars, Flemish ducatoons, French crowns, Portuguese crusadoes, and Dutch three guilder pieces, at specified rates: and the variety of the Spanish dollars is designated thus:

Dollars of	Dwts.	Grains.	Value sterling.	Value currency.
Seville, or Mexico, weight,	17	12	s. d. 4 6	s. d. 6 0
Seville, or Peruvian, do.	17	12	4 5	5 10 2-3
Pillar dollar, do.	17	12	4 6 3-4	6 1

Which several circumstances fully establish the fact, that the Spanish dollar has been, throughout the entire period of our commercial history, the practical or legal money unit, and the chief instrument of exchange.

In 1728, the standard purity of silver in the Spanish dollar was reduced to eleven dinhios, equal to 383.2 grains, being a reduction in value of 1 1-2 per cent.; and a royal edict, issued in 1772, established the regulation which yet prevails, of ten dinhios and three-fourths fine, equivalent to three hundred and seventy-four grains and seven-eighths to each dollar, with but one grain fine for remedy.

In 1786, the Congress of the confederation adopted a dollar as the money unit, and fixed its value at 375 64-100 grains of fine silver, the coins to contain one-twelfth part of alloy.

General Hamilton, in his celebrated report upon the establishment of the mint in 1791, recognised the Spanish dollar as the practical standard of the United States; but, from some cause not now susceptible of satisfactory explanation, he does not appear to have ascertained correctly the precise value of that coin which he evidently desired to adopt as the unit and basis of our monetary system. The art of assay must have been then very imperfectly understood in the United States, as he notes a difference of twenty-four grains in the result of various experiments; an incredible disproportion in coins of established and universally good reputation.

The European assays, which returned the quantity of fine silver at three hundred and sixty-eight to three hundred and seventy-four grains, were probably a correct record of every variety in circulation; but, as the regulations of all mints are dictated with fractional precision, it ought to have been inferred that a discrepancy of six grains was attributable to wear, and not to irregularity in the fabrication of such a valuable commodity. General Hamilton assumed the average, instead of the highest assay, as the groundwork of his system; and having added thereto one-fourth of a grain, in order to attain numerical exactness in the relative value of gold, our dollar or money unit was finally regulated in 1792 by a law of Congress, which altered the value of the unit adopted in 1786, in the following terms: "There shall be, from time to time, struck and coined at the said mint, dollars or units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, as the same is now current, and to contain three hundred and seventy-one grains and one-fourth of pure, or four hundred and sixteen grains of standard silver."

The early operations of the mint do not appear to have conformed to this legal regulation. Amongst various assays made in London by eminent artists, as furnished by Dr. Kelly, American dollars are stated as follows:

Years.	Weight.	English standard.	Grains of fine silver.
	dwt. grs.	dwt.
1795,	17 8	6 1 2 worse,	373.6
1798,	17 10 1-2	7 do.	375
1802,	17 10	10 1-2 do.	368.3
Average of 8 years,	17 8	8 1-2 do.	370

Whatever may have been the rate or regularity of the mint operations, the quantity of dollars coined in twenty-three years, ending with 1816, (1,400,000,) was too trivial to create any distinction in value in internal circulation: our customary standard, the Spanish dollar, constituted then, and at all times, the chief portion of the metallic currency, as well as of the specie held by the banks. It continued to be the practical tender and measure of contracts; and the concurrent circulation of so small a portion of our own coins occasioned no inconvenient discrimination. Congress ceased to regulate the value of one description of foreign coins after another, until, finally, in 1827, none were recognised as legal tenders, except our ancient money, the "Spanish milled dollar." If plurality rightfully confers denomination, these dollars should always have been designated as "Spanish American dollars;" they were coined by the mints of this continent, and the dollars of Spain were rarely seen in circulation.

Political events have given new and more respectable titles to the countries from whence these coins have always issued, and a change of name alone has withdrawn the privilege of presenting these dollars as a legal tender in payments.

Very recently a demand for specie, upon one of the most respectable banks in our commercial metropolis, was met by a tender of dollars coined by the mints of America, formerly Spanish, and refused: the friendly aid of another institution furnished the required amount in United States' coin, and relieved the bank from the mortifying and painful alternative of acknowledging its inability to redeem its notes with lawful money; thereby hazarding the enforcement of the penal article of its charter, which inflicts twelve per cent. per annum interest until the demand is legally discharged. The money tendered was well known to be of the same standard as the "Spanish milled dollars," and about one-half per cent. more valuable than our coin; fulfilling, in every essential quality, the spirit and object of the law, yet liable, on any occasion, to be refused, from a nominal discrepancy with the legal requisition.

The various laws of Congress in respect to foreign coins having obviously contemplated their rejection from general circulation so soon as circumstances might conveniently authorize that measure, and as the "Spanish milled dollar" will ere long disappear in foreign trade, the present occasion appears favorable to an expanded consideration of this subject.

In countries where gold and silver compose exclusively, or chiefly, the currency, it is a general and very convenient practice to use national coins. The public seal is a satisfactory evidence of their value, and the money unit and its parts, being uniformly exhibited, facilitates computation. This usual practice did not, however, obtain, when our circulation was principally metallic; and the motives of convenience, which recommend an extensive issue of standard coins, cease to have influence in our present circumstances. Our currency is bank notes, to the exclusion of the precious metals, except as change. The money unit of the United States, or its concurrent tender, "Spanish milled dollars," is rarely, if ever, seen in circulation. The currency differs from that of all other nations extensively commercial, in being truly and effectively paper, secured by a specie fund, held by its issuers, the banks.

The public are deeply interested in the amount of this safety fund; but it does not appear to be of any importance to their convenience or security, whether it consists of gold, or of silver, of coins, or bullion.

Its peculiar character cannot be of any consequence to the banks, as their interest merely requires a supply sufficient for every exigency, of whatever may be designated lawful money.

Gold and silver, whether coined or not, are viewed in the commercial world as bullion, and valued according to their quantity of fine metal. The stamp of the United States adds nothing to the value of the precious metals abroad; and, as it is a costly impression, it should only be applied when necessary to the general convenience of the community. It is not perceived in what respect the public convenience is promoted by the coinage of silver, which passes temporarily into the vaults of the banks, and is soon afterwards again melted by refiners in foreign nations.

That such is the course and effect of commercial enterprise, will be evident upon reference to the mint operations, and to our trade in the precious metals.

The director of the mint states that the American coin possessed by the Bank of the United States, and its branches, is less than two millions of dollars, or about one-sixth part of its specie. Assuming a similar ratio for the State banks, (which is a liberal estimate, considering the advantageous position of the former institution,) the entire amount of American coin held by the banks does not, likely, much exceed four millions of dollars. Taking the issues of one, two, and three dollar notes, in the Eastern States, as a guide, it does not seem probable that there is a greater amount of silver in general circulation, of all denominations, than five millions of dollars, of which, perhaps, three to four millions are American coin.

According to this estimate, the national coins do not, likely, exceed seven to eight millions of dollars in silver. The mint has fabricated thirty-seven millions, of which nine millions were of gold. Considering that twenty millions of silver coins have been issued since 1817, and about eleven millions within the last five years, the inutility and inexpediency of extensive operations at the mint are manifest. Our coins being less valuable than Spanish dollars, or those of the new American States, would have the effect to maintain them exclusively in domestic circulation, if the currency was metallic; but the same cause, that of being overrated, induces the banks to tender them on all occasions when specie is demanded for exportation, unless they can obtain an acceptable profit on their foreign dollars. The difference of intrinsic value is about four to five mills each, but foreign dollars have commanded from one-half to one and one-fourth per cent. premium; hence the inferiority in value of our coins tends to hasten their exportation.

The amount of foreign gold and silver coins exported annually, during five years ending with September, 1829, appears to be about six and one-third millions of dollars.

These various details appear to authorize the following conclusions:

First. That it is of no importance to the public, or to the banks, the description of the silver money that constitutes the specie fund, provided a sufficiency of American coin for change can be obtained, and that Congress give a legal character, as was the practice formerly, to the foreign coins which usually circulate in general commerce.

Second. That American coins being overrated, light in comparison with foreign dollars, does not prevent their free exportation.

Third. That the demand for silver for internal circulation is of very trivial amount.

Fourth. That a large portion of the gold and silver coins imported is purchased with foreign produce, and is in transit, destined, through our agency, for distribution, to supply the wants of other nations.

If these opinions are well founded, the gold and silver coins imported are commercial commodities, calculated for foreign consumption, and entitled to every facility and privilege consistent with sound policy.

An error having been committed in establishing the money unit "of the value of a Spanish dollar" at three hundred and seventy-one grains and one-fourth of pure silver, there are two modes in which the existing and consequent inconvenience may be remedied.

First. The error may be rectified, without inflicting any injury of consequence, or prejudice to property or contracts, by causing the rate of coinage to conform to the original and clearly expressed intention of the law, that of three hundred and seventy-four grains of fine silver to the unit or dollar, being the value of a Spanish dollar in 1792, and limiting the tender of the half dollars now in circulation to payments of ten dollars; or,

Second. The inconvenient effect of the error may be corrected by adhering to the established and existing silver standard, by rejecting the ancient currency and money of contract, a "Spanish milled dollar," as a tender by tale, and by estimating all foreign coins as bullion, and regulating the measure of its value by its quantity.

The committee are decidedly in favor of this latter course. A new and powerful mint is nearly completed, and American coins ought hereafter to be the only metallic money in domestic circulation. The Spanish dollar will soon be unknown in foreign trade; the dollars of the new American States have not yet been legally recognised; and specie being unusually abundant, the circumstances are propitious to the permanent adoption of a measure which has been long contemplated.

The silver coins in the banks should be viewed as the money of commerce, the value of which is determined by its quantity of fine metal. This course is in accordance with sound mercantile principles, and with former usage.

Congress has repeatedly sanctioned it by regulating the value of British, Portuguese, French, and Spanish gold; and also of five franc pieces and crowns of France; giving them currency, according to their weight when tendered, at rates calculated to minute fractions, varying with the standards of their respective mints; a course of policy which is equitable to all in its effects, and beneficial as well as accommodating to commercial operations.

Our merchants import these dollars to discharge their debts, or to make purchases from foreign nations. When the imported dollar of 373½ to 374 grains of fine silver is received on arrival at the value of 371½ grains, the importing merchant is taxed two-thirds of one per cent. upon his property, which is money. Suppose these dollars are minted into American coins, one hundred-dollars and one-half will be furnished to the depositor for every one hundred dollars imported, at the expense of the United States of one and one-fourth per cent., according to the statement of the director of the mint; and when thus converted, at this heavy expense to the public, the one hundred and one-half dollars of American coin are less valuable abroad than the one hundred dollars imported, as will be perceived by reference to copies of actual sales in France.*

If these coins were a legal tender on the principle of regulation applied to other coins noted, being current, by weight, at the correct value ascertained by mint experiments, that of 116 1-10 cents per ounce, justice would be rendered to the importing merchant; a heavy annual expense would be saved to the United States; and banking and commercial transactions would be greatly facilitated. If our currency was metallic, public convenience might reasonably demand, and properly discharge, the expense of coining all silver previous to its being tendered in payments.

The foreign dollars being imported for no other object than exportation, it appears to be a departure from sound policy, to countenance regulations that cause a deduction tantamount to the imposition of a tax of one-half per cent. on a commodity, as it were, but temporarily in entropet.

It is yet more injudicious to incur a heavy annual expense at the mint, in giving these coins a new character (that of United States' dollars) less known in commerce, and, consequently, rather a disadvantageous alteration.

The chances of profit to the merchant are greater when an export of the precious metals is made in foreign coins. They may be returned to the countries from whence they issued, or where they are current, and be used on arrival as effective money; or some of them may be received in particular States with partiality, as is the case in France with Spanish dollars, or those of the new States, which appear to command six centimes each, or about 1 1-7 per cent. more than our coins, although the difference, according to the mint test, is but one-half per cent.

It has been suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Director of the Mint, whose opinions are justly entitled to great respect, that the existing inconveniences would be removed, by regulating the Mexican dollar alone as a legal tender, by tale, in all payments.

The committee are inclined to view this recommendation as not sufficiently efficacious. Our uniform appellation of "Spanish milled dollars" embraced the coins of Spain, and of its various mints in America. The discrimination suggested might not be viewed agreeably; and there is no evidence that any of the South American dollars (except those of Colombia) differ in any degree as to standard fineness, nor is the least valuable of them inferior to our dollar.

The measure proposed would prevent the recurrence of the difficulty experienced at New York, but it could have no tendency to establish Mexican dollars of 373½ to 374 grains in concurrent and promiscuous circulation with American coin of 371½ grains of fine silver. It would not relieve the mint from its present oppressive duty of coining, uselessly, foreign dollars, at the heavy expense of twenty thousand dollars yearly, nor would it produce the desirable and equitable effect of enabling our enterprising merchants to obtain the just value for their money on its arrival. Formerly, when a merchant imported crowns or five franc pieces, or gold, he was authorized to tender them in all payments at their intrinsic worth in fine metal, as ascertained by the mint. If this just right be so restricted as to protect the community in their ordinary dealings from inconvenience, the regulation of all such foreign coins as our merchants trade in, as legal tenders, (according to quantity of fine metal,) cannot fail to facilitate and benefit commercial transactions.

In conformity with these views, the committee recommend that the dollars of Mexico, Central America, Peru, Chili, and La Plata, and also the dollars restamped in Brazil, of the denomination of 960 reas, shall be a legal tender in all payments above the sum of one hundred dollars, at the rate of 116 1-10 cents per ounce troy, provided the aforesaid coins shall be of the usual standard fineness of 10 ounces 15½ pennyweights of fine silver to the pound troy of 12 ounces; and that the five franc pieces of France, of the standard of 10 ounces 16 pennyweights fine to the pound troy, shall likewise be a legal tender in all payments exceeding one hundred dollars, at the rate of 116 4-10 cents per ounce troy.

The committee beg leave to annex to this report some valuable documents in relation to the mint, which have been furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury. The communications from the highly respectable director of that institution will be perused with much interest and satisfaction, as they exhibit great skill and accuracy in the management of a scientific, intricate, and important establishment.

* See Secretary of the Treasury's report on gold coins.

From these statements, it appears that the mint has coined, since its establishment in 1794, about thirty-seven millions of dollars, of which amount four-fifths probably have been exported, leaving only seven to eight millions in the United States, after incurring the heavy expenditure of nearly one million of dollars.

The silver coinage of the last five years is nearly eleven millions, or about two-fifths of the entire quantity minted of that metal. Of these eleven millions, about eight millions have been coined from foreign dollars, chiefly of that description which is most current in general commerce. The new character will certainly not be advantageous to their final disposal, though it has been effected at an expense to the public of fully one hundred thousand dollars.

The committee have already expressed the opinion that this weighty expenditure of the public money on standard foreign coins is not recompensed by any sort of public benefit; and the following extract from a letter of the director of the mint affords strong confirmatory testimony of its correctness.

"The specie of the United States' Bank is now nearly eleven millions, and of this amount they have less than two millions in our coin—a sum which does not exceed the amount delivered that bank from the mint within the present year. Our coinage for that institution, from 1824 to this time, exceeds eleven millions of dollars."

This account seems to authorize the impression that our coins go abroad almost as speedily as they are fabricated. Whatever may be truly the case, it is very evident that the minting of foreign coins is a useless expenditure of the public revenue to a large amount annually.

If the total quantity of coins in general circulation be correctly estimated at five millions of dollars, the wear and necessary supply for an increasing population cannot, under our present system of money, create a yearly demand for more than two to three hundred thousand dollars of new coins, in addition to the amount in circulation.

The deposit of silver bullion, for five years past, appears to be increasing; and its annual average being $600,000, there is no reason to doubt but the mint will be abundantly supplied with silver for every useful and desirable object.

The director of the mint is of opinion that certificates of deposits may be issued in one to five days, and the committee recommend to the consideration of the House the expediency of adopting such measures as will authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount of all deposits of bullion as speedily as the value can be ascertained, deducting therefrom one half per cent., which the director states to be the usual discount on these certificates.

The committee are of opinion, from the mint return, that there must be a scarcity of quarter dollars, and they think the operations of the mint might be advantageously extended in the fabrication of that coin, and also of dimes and half dimes. Late experiments amongst the scientific artists of France encourage the expectation of improvements in the mode of assay, calculated to establish greater accuracy and uniformity in its results.

The suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in reference to the relative proportion of alloy in coins, is judicious, and its adoption would simplify the process of alloying. The decimal divisions are convenient, and appropriate to our monetary system. One-tenth part of standard coins, whether gold or silver, is recommended by convenience. The existing proportion of 179 to 1,664, in silver coins, is very irregular, and without any apparent benefit.

It is to be regretted that any of our silver coins should contain minute fractions of a grain, when an entire grain of silver is only worth about one-fourth of one cent. The singular minuteness of fractions, usual in all mint regulations, is inconvenient in calculation, and unsuitable as a measure, where the value depends exclusively on its quantity. It was wisely and appositely remarked by an eminent philosopher, that the "broken proportion of baser metals to silver, in the standard of the several mints, seems to have been introduced by the skill of men employed in coining, to keep that art (as all trades are called) a mystery, rather than for any use or necessity there was for such broken numbers."

The committee, in conclusion, beg leave to report the accompanying bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Select Committee on Coins, January 5, 1831.

SIR: I am instructed by the Select Committee on Coins to enclose for your consideration a copy of the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 23d ultimo, and to ask the favor of your communicating to them information on the following points:

1st. What has been the result of the experience of the director of the mint, in regard to a comparative estimate of silver dollars, issued by Spain, or its American provinces, and those subsequently coined by the new Governments in those provinces, as to fineness, weight, and workmanship?

2d. Has any thing occurred in the course of his investigations, rendering it necessary to vary the statements which he furnished to the President of the United States, in December, 1826, of the average result of numerous assays of dollars of the new American States, or of five franc pieces of France?

3d. Are Spanish American dollars, or those of the new States, or five franc pieces, frequently deposited, and in considerable amounts, for coinage? And does the return in American coin realize the value estimated in the report of assays, yielding to the depositor on the two former a gain, by tale, of four to seven mills each? Or what is the general or average result?

4th. What is found to be the degree of fineness of Plata Pina, and also of other silver bullion, usually imported from Mexico and South America?

5th. What have been the relative proportions of silver bullion, and of coin, (distinguishing old or defaced from new, or coins of full weight,) annually received at the mint, from 1816 to 1830, inclusive? And what quantity of silver coin, distinguishing the denominations, has been minted yearly during that period?

6th. What is the average amount of loss in coinage upon the estimated value by assay of silver bullion or coin, to the depositor and to the mint respectively?

7th. Is the loss thus accruing upon bullion influenced by the relative fineness of the metal, or is it greater upon old or new coins? And what is the amount per cent. upon each denomination?

8th. What is the average expense (including and distinguishing the amount of loss sustained by the mint) of coining half dollars? And does the aggregate cost vary, and to what extent, when manufactured from bullion or coin?

9th. What number of half dollars can be coined monthly at the mint, when at full work?

10th. What quantity of the like work will the new mint probably execute? And when is it expected to commence operations?

11th. What are the relative quantities of dollars and half dollars that can be coined in an equal period of time? And what is the amount of aggregate expense respectively?

12th. Assuming the experience of recent years as the basis for estimating the probable extent of coinage of all descriptions, within what time, from the receipt of bullion or coin, might the mint undertake to stipulate with the depositor for the delivery of coin when the new establishment is completed?

13th. How many days usually elapse before a mint certificate is issued? And would it be convenient and practicable to fix a certain and short period for rendering these receipts, without reference to the quantity of bullion or coin deposited?

14th. What is the rate or discount at which the banks in Philadelphia generally cash mint certificates?

15th. Does the assayer melt the entire mass of metal or coin deposited before he puts it to the test, or is the estimate of purity made upon an assay of a small portion of the quantity? And if so, is it found generally, in completing the refining, that the result corresponds or disagrees with the original estimate?

16th. Is the mode of assaying silver at the mint invariable? And if so, are the results uniform, or are important variations occasionally experienced in testing similar mixtures of metal? What is the mean heat in fusion? What is the proportion of lead to fine metal? Are the cupels of the ordinary shape, or formed with high sides?

17th. Have any experiments been made at the mint, testing the fineness of silver by what is termed the humid mode, precipitating a quantity of silver (previously dissolved in nitric acid) in a preparation of water and marine salt?

18th. The Secretary of the Treasury will oblige the committee by causing assays to be executed with the greatest accuracy, and with all convenient despatch, of nine whole and nine half dollars, coined at the mint, and taken indiscriminately from a mass of recent issues, and also of nine dollars lately minted in Mexico, and in Peru, during the same year, and also of nine five franc pieces of full weight, the operation to be performed on one-third part of each denomination of these coins, at the mean or ordinary temperature used, at a low heat, and also at an elevated temperature; and, in one of each of these three distinct operations, the quantity of lead used is to be precisely one-third of the weight of fine silver.

The committee request your opinion as to the expediency, in the existing state of our currency, of making the silver dollars of the late Spanish possessions in America, and five franc pieces of France, legal tenders in payments, according to our standard; and they will feel obliged by any suggestions which you may think it advisable to present as to the propriety or utility of additional regulations for the government of the mint, in respect to minting foreign coins, when of full weight and standard fineness, as well as to the practicability or advantage of the Treasury assuming the responsibility of disbursing promptly the amount of all deposits of bullion at the mint, at the average or current rate of discount upon mint certificates.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

CAMPBELL P. WHITE.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February, 1831.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose you two letters from the director of the mint, in answer to the inquiries propounded in your letters of the 5th and 14th January. The considerations, which seem entitled to weight in determining the propriety of making Mexican dollars and five franc pieces a legal tender, are so fully presented by the director of the mint, that there appears to be but little to add. I do not perceive any injury that can arise from admitting both these coins as a tender for a limited time, provided it be done at such weight as will clearly make it the interest of all who hold them to cause them to be coined. The director of the mint has estimated the cost of coinage to the holder of bullion at about one per cent. The foreign coins intended to be made a tender, should of course contain an excess of metal over the legal value, which would somewhat more than remunerate for this loss, as an inducement to send them to the mint.

I beg leave to observe, in connexion with the various matters referred to your committee, that, in the report made to the Senate in 1830, on the relative value of gold and silver, the ratio of 1 to 15 5-8 was recommended as the most suitable to be established in the coin. It has since been suggested from a highly respectable source, that the ratio of 1 to 15.5769 might be preferable, on account of its rendering the ratio in the standard metal 1 to 16, whereby the coins could be used as weights for each other, one silver dollar being made thereby equal to sixteen gold dollars. At the first view, this effect appeared so desirable as to justify a corresponding modification in the ratio to secure it; but, upon further reflection, it appears to me, that coined pieces, subject to continual change by attrition, cannot be depended upon as standards of weight, and more especially as the small silver pieces upon this plan must be chiefly used to weigh gold coins. The former, of course soon becoming light, will be bad standards to weigh gold with, and, so far as they might be relied upon for that purpose, would tend to encourage the circulation of light gold coins.

Another modification has occurred to me, which is not liable to these objections, and has all the simplicity which could be desired. If the standard for gold and silver coins be established at 9-10 fine, 1-10 alloy, and the ratio of 1 to 15 5-8 in the pure metals be adopted, the eagle will weigh 237½ grains pure, and 264 grains standard, and the silver dollar will weigh 371½ grains pure, and 412½ standard, which will render the weight of the eagle and its parts in whole grains, and also that of the dollar and its parts in grains and binal divisions thereof.

The adoption of 9-10 fine for the standard will also be attended with some advantages, whenever it may be necessary to ascertain the value of the coins by weight. The more simple this intricate subject can be made, the greater number of persons will be protected from the skill of the few. The present standard for our silver coins of 1485-1664 is peculiarly exceptionable on this account; and as there is, I believe, no doubt but the mixture of 9-10 fine, and 1-10 alloy, will make as durable a coin as any other, there seems to be really no objection whatever to such a modification. I need scarcely add, that, in all the changes I have suggested in the report on the relative values of the metal, or elsewhere, the present weight of the fine silver in the dollar is not intended to be changed, or its intrinsic value affected in the slightest degree. When the weight of the dollar was fixed at 416 grains standard, it was probably intended to correspond as nearly as possible with the Spanish dollar, then almost the only coin in circulation. That reason is not now entitled to much, if any, weight, as the proportion of Spanish dollars to United States' is small, and, when the increased power of the mint takes effect, must daily diminish.

I take the occasion further to remark that the ratio of 1 to 15 5-8 renders the pound sterling $4 75½; but as the intrinsic value of the pound sterling in silver dollars must depend on the market value of the fine silver contained in a dollar, it is not important that the legal par of exchange should conform to the regulation of the relative value of the metals in the coins. It would, in fact, be more convenient to make the legal par conform to the market value of the metal in which the standard of value in the United States is determined; because, in that case, there would be no difference between the nominal and the real par. The relative value of gold and silver in the market, as heretofore ascertained, is very near 1 to 15.8. The pound sterling will, therefore, at real par, be worth $4 80; and if the legal par were to be changed, the pound sterling should be estimated at that sum, which is in fact its present true value, as estimated in all operations of exchange with England. And if it were so fixed by law, it would simplify these operations materially; besides furnishing a most convenient mode for computing exchanges with Britain: 240 pence (pound sterling) being equal to 480 cents; 1 penny sterling is equal to 2 cents.

But to alter the legal par from $4 44 to $4 80 for the pound sterling, would increase the invoice value of importation from England about 8 per cent. The change ought not, therefore, to be made, without full consideration of its effect in this particular. In the mean time, however, there is no objection to changing the ratio of the pure metal in the coins. There can be little doubt but that the present ratio of 1 to 15 fixes gold altogether too low; and unless the United States' mines should furnish it in such abundance as to reduce the price throughout the world, it will not be possible to maintain gold to any extent in circulation, without raising its value in the coins. The ratio of 1 to 15 5-8, and standard of 9-10 fine, are recommended by so many considerations, as to require some special reason for adopting any other; but if that be deemed proper, I should strongly incline to prefer a lower rather than a higher valuation of the gold, for the reasons stated in the report before referred to. But on this point I can only observe that there is no reasonable ground now visible for apprehending an injurious exportation of the silver coin under the ratio proposed; and we may be the more encouraged in adopting it, by the decision of the Senate in favor of a considerably higher value for gold, viz. 15.9 to 1.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM.

Hon. C. P. WHITE.

MENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Philadelphia, January 22, 1831.

SIR: In compliance with your request, under date of the 7th, accompanying a copy of the letter therein referred to, addressed to the department by a select committee of the House of Representatives, I have now the honor to submit the information in my possession; on the several points presented by the committee, which I beg leave to refer to, numerically, in their order, without reciting them.

1st. The dollars issued by the new States of Mexico, Central America, and Peru, are equal in fineness and weight to those issued under the dominion of Spain. The Bolivian dollar, and that of La Plata, are probably equal to the foregoing, but are rare and little known at the mint. The Chilean dollar is of the same fineness as the above, but inferior thereto in weight, usually, by one grain each. All those coins exhibit, in general, a less careful workmanship than the ordinary Spanish dollar. The Colombian coin, improperly called a dollar, is far inferior to its denomination, both in fineness and weight.

2d. The statements communicated to the President, December 27, 1826, are not impaired by the results of subsequent assays, in regard to the fineness of the coins issued by the new American States. They are, however, found to weigh slightly less in recent deposits than those statements exhibit. This results partly from the increasing proportion of coins, somewhat diminished by wear, which enter now into all deposits of that description, and partly from the fact that our weights have been adjusted since that day by the standard troy pound designated in the act of Congress of May 19th, 1828, and have thereby become a little heavier. We have had so little experience in regard to the five franc pieces since 1826, that nothing can be usefully added, respecting coins, to the statements then made, except in regard to their weight, which will be effected in some degree by the considerations just mentioned. A few specimens of the issues of 1829 were tried in that year at your request, and their value found to be ninety-three cents four mills, as mentioned in my letter of the 30th September, annexed to your report on the value of gold and silver.

3d. Spanish dollars, and those of the new Mexican States, especially Mexico, form a very considerable proportion of the deposits at the mint, as will appear by referring to table A, hereto annexed. The considerations mentioned under No. 2 tend to render the result less favorable to the depositors than the statements before alluded to would indicate. The average gain on Mexican dollars, as now received, may be estimated at from four to five mills each.

In regard to the Spanish dollar, our experience within the past year, and especially in recent deposits, has been conspicuously at variance with the statements of 1826. Several deposits of large sums have been found to afford a very trivial gain on recoinage. This is due wholly to a deficit in weight not exhibited at the mint in any former year, and indicating that a considerable proportion of the Spanish dollars remaining in the United States are the residue of parcels from which the most perfect coins have been selected. The effect of this, added to the suspension of new emissions, by which their average weight could be partially sustained, must render such results in relation to deposits of the Spanish dollar frequent hereafter. A deposit of these coins, amounting to $170,000, weighed on the 13th instant, is a further illustration of this fact—the gain being only nine-tenths of a mill per dollar.

Five franc pieces are not deposited in such quantities as to afford data for an average in regard to them. No deposit of this coin, meriting notice, has been made in recent years.

4th. Of the amount of bullion received within the period embraced by table A, and exhibited in the first column, above one-tenth part consisted of Plata Pina. This term is applied to silver collected by the aid of mercury, and brought to the mint without having been melted. The average value of this form of bullion, when reduced to a condition suitable for assaying, may be stated at $1 25 per ounce troy, being about eight and one-third per cent. above the standard value of our silver coins. It is to be noted, however, that Plata Pina is subjected to melting before it is assayed, and in this process is diminished, on an average, about three per cent. in weight, by the dissipation of some remains of mercury, and of humidity absorbed by the porous quality of this form of bullion, as also the separation of other extraneous matters occasionally found therein; so that, in this condition of its ordinary delivery at the mint, its value may be estimated at about five and one-third per cent. above its weight in silver coins. Bullion of other descriptions, on an average of the whole amount embraced in the table, is found to be worth about $1 21 cents per ounce, being about five per cent. above the value of standard silver. It is proper to state, that all silver, not in the form of coin, is in this arrangement denominated bullion, which thus includes a proportion of plate. The great mass of it, however, consists of silver which has been melted only, but not wrought in any manner.

5th. Table A exhibits the proportions of silver bullion and coin received at the mint, and also the amount of the several denominations of silver coins issued annually, from 1815 to 1830, inclusive. No separation is made of old and defaced from new and perfect coins. They are all received by weight as bullion. In the column of various coins, a large amount of irregular coins of Spanish America is embraced, called hammered and cast dollars; also, all the European coins, of which, except the five franc pieces, the amount is inconsiderable; and of these, less than two hundred thousand dollars are to be found separately deposited, within the period assumed. The column denominated Mexican dollars embraces also that of Central America, Peru, and Chili, which are generally deposited with the Mexican, but constitute an inconsiderable proportion of the amount under this head.

6th. The average loss by wastage on silver coinage may be stated at the fourth of one per cent. on the amount coined. The last four years give a small fraction less. This is borne by the United States; the depositor receiving in coins, agreeably to law, all the fine metal he brings, and without charge if the bullion be of standard quality. If it be above standard, the depositor is charged for the requisite alloy, and, if below standard, he is charged with the expense of the materials required for refining.

7th. The wastage is not influenced by the character of the bullion as to fineness, unless it be such as to require refining. In this operation there must be some loss, and all the processes by which other bullion is exposed to loss are subsequently to be passed through. The waste on refining will be in some proportion to the degree of baseness, but the ratio has not been determined. The wastage is ascertained only at the end of the year. Very few deposits of coins require to be refined. They are among the deposits, therefore, liable to the least wastage, and there is no appreciable difference, in this respect, between new and old coins.

8th. The expense of the coinage of silver is necessarily combined with that of gold. On an average, however, of the years 1826 and 1828, inclusive, in which the coinage of gold was inconsiderable, and may, therefore, in a general estimate, be disregarded, the expense, excluding wastage, it appears, may be stated at one per cent., with a very near approximation to exactness—the wastage, as before mentioned, being the fourth of one per cent., and making the whole expense for that period about one and a quarter per cent., which may be considered as the average for a silver coinage of about $2,300,000 yearly. This per centage of expenditure will diminish with the amount of issues, a portion of the annual charges of the mint being fixed. The gradations of reduction cannot, however, be now determined, but it is believed that the expense on a coinage of four millions of dollars may be effected at something less than one per cent., including wastage.

There is no apparent difference in expense between deposits of the ordinary character of bullion, and those of foreign coins usually received at the mint. Both unwrought bullion and coins, which require to be melted before assaying, are to that extent more expensive to the United States than deposits in which this may be dispensed with, the materials and labor thus required being a part of the general expenses of the mint; but the difference eludes notice by its minuteness, when singly designated.

9th. Our present force is adequate to the coinage of six hundred thousand half dollars monthly. This result will be in some measure affected by the attention given to the smaller denominations, but so that the amount of the year's coinage will accord nearly with the above. This is exclusive of gold, the amount of which, if unusually large, will somewhat impede the silver coinage.

10th. The new mint will be competent, no doubt, to the coinage of ten millions, in due proportions, of the different denominations of our coins, if bullion be regularly supplied. Its utmost power I would not now venture to indicate. The coinage will, it is hoped, commence as early as August next. The fourth of July was designated as the time, when the corner stone was laid; but this, I apprehend, cannot be accomplished. The establishment will not probably be in readiness for vigorous operation till near the close of the present year. It is not relied on to promote the issues of this year more than will be equivalent to the retardation of a removal.

11th. Three thousand dollars, in dollars, most probably more, may be coined in the same time as two thousand in half dollars, with an equal number of presses; and the annual expense, wastage excepted, would be about the same. The wastage per cent. on dollars would be less than on the lower denominations, but the difference would be unimportant between dollars and half dollars.

12th. It is anticipated that the demand for coinage may be met by the new mint, with a delay rarely exceeding twenty days. Prompt payment, as soon as the value shall have been ascertained, will, it is supposed, be practicable for all deposits of moderate amount.

13th. The value of a deposit requiring only a single assay is generally ascertained, and a certificate issued in twenty-four hours. If there are several parcels, and especially if they require previous melting, the time is extended to two or three days; and if the number be large, and also require melting, the delay will occasionally extend to four or five days.

14th. The banks generally cash mint certificates at a deduction of the half of one per cent., if the coinage is not apprehended to be very remote: the Bank of the United States, without regard to the interval to elapse before coinage, receives mint certificates at that reduction.

15th. The assayer takes a small piece from each bar or separate mass of bullion, and estimates the whole value from the assay of that piece. The result, in regard to the mass generally, confirms the correctness of the estimate deduced from the assay thus made. In a given instance this will be, occasionally, incorrect; on an average, however, it will be found liable to no important failure. In the process, now frequent at the mint, of parting gold and silver, the small assay is tested by an actual analysis of the whole mass; permitting the two metals to be separately weighed. This is a happy experiment of the correctness of the assay, and the accordance with it is generally satisfactory. It may be remarked that the purity of our coins is not dependent wholly on the assay of bullion or foreign coins when deposited; all ingots prepared therefrom for coinage are, before delivery to the chief coiner, assayed again, and returned to the melting pot when found to require it.

Foreign coins of well established character, when deposited, are estimated on their known fineness, the assay being from time to time employed to ascertain their uniformity in this respect. This is particularly convenient and almost indispensable in our present establishment: the delay of melting large deposits of coins would be sensibly felt in the business of the year. In the new mint this difficulty will be removed, and, without retarding the ordinary operations, coins can be very generally melted before assaying.

16th. The mode of assaying hitherto pursued for silver has been that of cupellation. It is not perfectly constant in its results. A liability to errors amounting to the half of one per cent. is well known to be involved in the process, if the ordinary directions for conducting it are relied on, without any corrective of its irregularities. This liability is, however, very much restricted by introducing into the muffle, along with the assays in question, another piece of determinate standard, and near the fineness of the metal tried. The causes which operated to render the assay incorrect, extend their influence to the proof piece, and afford the measure of the corrections to be applied in the case—not a perfect, but a valuable correction.

The assayer of the mint has acquired, by long experience, a facility in judging of the condition of his muffle, which, frequently confirmed by the employment of the proof piece, renders his results more constant and exact than are usually obtained, I apprehend, from this process.

The heat employed is not determined by any form of pyrometer. It is, during the early part of the process, insufficient to sustain fine silver in a state of fusion. Towards the close, the heat is excited as the alloy is dissipated, so as to keep the silver fused when it becomes fine, though it would not, during the process, melt fine silver. This appears to be the desirable point of temperature. At a lower heat, the assay would become fixed and constant before it would become fine, and the process thus be defeated. The eye of the assayer judges when the silver has become divested of its alloy. Too high a temperature urges on the process, and wastes a portion of the silver.

The difficulty of measuring high degrees of heat accurately, occasions wide discrepancies in the temperature assigned by different authorities as the melting point of silver. It is probable that the final temperature of a successful assay may be about 4,000 degrees of Fahrenheit.

The proportion of lead to fine silver, in our ordinary assays, is about seven grains of lead to one of silver. The common form of cupel is employed, a shallow cup.

No silver assays have been made here in the humid way. The subject having, however, attracted the attention of foreign assayers and chemists, and the probability being great that they may be led to select this method, under some modification, in preference to cupellation, a series of experiments will be considered worthy of attention with us, though the practice before mentioned, of recurring frequently to a proof piece, renders us less sensible of the necessity of a change in this regard. A facile process in the humid way would, however, be decidedly preferable.

18th. The assays requested have been completed, and the results thereof will be seen in table B. In regard to a particular experiment, of performing a part of those assays with a portion of lead, exactly one-third of the fine silver, the suggestion has been exactly complied with. This quantity of lead forms, however, no envelope for the metal tried. An assay piece, thus exposed, was uniformly reduced about five pennyweights below those enveloped in the usual form with lead, and placed in the same muffle. After three trials, with similar results, the experiment was discontinued, as it somewhat interfered with the equal arrangement of the other assay pieces.

Nine pieces of each of the coins mentioned by the committee, taken without selection, except as to dates, the latest being sought for, were severally divided into three sections. Assay pieces were made from each section of the same coin, and exposed in the same muffle, successively, to the several grades of temperature. The result given under each degree of temperature in the table, is, therefore, the average of three assays, thus made, of three different specimens of the same coin.

In all cases, the same coin was experimented on successively, through the different grades of heat, without interruption, the heat being further raised for each succeeding experiment.

The proof piece, of the fineness stated, was always introduced along with the assay piece. The variable effect on this proof, under a temperature intended to be the same, indicates the difficulty of adjusting this point, and the irregularities of result which this uncertainty of temperature involves. In the low and medium grade of temperature, which may be considered as the extreme limits of our ordinary assay heat, the highest error of the proof piece, from its actual fineness, it appears, is fifteen grains in excess. This is an error of fifteen grains fine silver in the troy pound of five thousand seven hundred and sixty grains standard, being a fraction over the fourth of one per cent. The assay piece, in this case, without the proof to correct it, would have given an enormous result to that extent.

The average of the low and medium temperatures, it appears, is very nearly true in the proof piece; the greatest deviation from the fineness due to it, combining the two assays, scarcely exceeds two grains. The true state of the coins will, therefore, be but derived from a similar average. If this be applied to the dollar of the United States alone, taking care to correct the assays by the proof, this coin appears one and one-fourth grains in the pound too fine. Applied in the same manner to the half dollar, this coin appears 5 6-13 grains inferior. The mean is 4 3-13, or the one-fourteenth of one per cent. nearly. The same measure being applied to the five franc piece, this coin appears three grains and two-thirds in the pound inferior to its standard, which is about the one-fifteenth of one per cent.

The result in regard to the Peruvian and Mexican dollars requires particular explanation. One section of the former of these coins gave constantly, in all temperatures, a degree of fineness higher, by nearly one and a half pennyweights, than the ordinary grade of that coin. In the Mexican, on the contrary, one section gave constantly a result about one pennyweight and eighteen grains inferior. In both descriptions, the other two sections gave results conformable to our ordinary experience. I have considered it best to report on both precisely as the facts occurred, without resorting to a change of specimens. There is not the smallest ground for supposing that either is any thing but an accidental variety. They exhibit strikingly the irregularities to which the ordinary assay is liable, if not cautiously conducted, and with a frequent reference to a proof standard. All the specimens, both of Peruvian and Mexican dollars, were of 1830, as were also the five franc pieces, except two of 1829, but equally perfect.

The inquiry respecting the expediency of making certain foreign coins a legal tender, is not, probably, intended to be addressed to me. I shall be excused, however, for expressing briefly that the condition of the Spanish dollar current at the present day renders its rejection probable, as a tender, and exposes those institutions which are liable to be called on for large payments to much embarrassment, while they may be well supplied with other dollars, worth more than their nominal value. The extension of the tender beyond the Mexican dollar will not, it is presumed, be necessary. That coin abounds in our country to an extent, probably, twofold the amount of all the other dollars of the new American States. It has become familiar to us, and is decidedly of more intrinsic value than the Spanish dollar has been for the last twenty years. In two or three years, so many of the Mexican dollars, which are profitable for coinage, will reach the mint, that the issues therefrom will place our currency beyond the reach of further embarrassment.

The amount of our own coins now in the United States cannot much exceed seventeen millions of dollars. This may be expected to be doubled in three years after the completion of the new mint. It could be much more rapidly done, if bullion should be abundantly and regularly supplied; but time will be required to solicit those coins from their distant position to the mint, unless the Government should adopt the policy of supplying bullion by a direct operation.

If the Mexican dollar be made a legal tender, it is presumed it will be in the same terms as those used in relation to the Spanish dollar, viz. at one hundred cents each, provided the weight thereof be not less than seventeen pennyweights and seven grains. There will thus be a sufficient inducement of profit on their coinage to compensate the banks for presenting them at the mint. They will be worth from four to five mills above their legal valuation.

The five franc pieces associate so inconveniently with our decimal denominations, that they have never been a popular coin. If, however, it should be deemed necessary to make them a legal tender again for a limited time, it is proper to observe, that the law by which they were formerly made so, involves an incongruity. They were made a legal tender at one dollar and sixteen cents per ounce, and also at ninety-three cents and three mills each, provided their weight should not be less than sixteen pennyweights and two grains. They never weigh this. It is above their weight when issued from the mint. It would seem judicious to have an inducement for the recoinage of five franc pieces, nearly equivalent to that of the Mexican dollar. The valuation of one dollar and sixteen cents per ounce will have this effect, their value being very nearly $1 16.4 per ounce. If made a tender by tale at ninety-three cents, provided their weight be not less than sixteen pennyweights and one grain, a similar inducement would remain: the five franc piece of sixteen pennyweights and one grain is worth ninety-three cents and three mills and one-third.

I may be permitted to say, in regard to further regulations for the mint, that it would be desirable to defer the subject until next session. There are various points which it is wished to submit, at that time, to the consideration of Congress, for the improvement of the institution. The whole system of laws in regard to it, which are now distributed through the various volumes of the acts of Congress, would be advantageous if digested into one act, with emendations in various particulars. In the interim, a series of careful experiments will be made, which is already commenced, on the subject of the humid assay for silver; the result of which can be usefully compared with those obtained by the measures now in train in Europe.

The payment of deposits on behalf of the treasury at the prevailing deduction, if not left optional with the depositor to accept or decline, would greatly restrict the amount of our deposits of foreign coins. The banks are the chief depositors of these; to them prompt payment is of no great moment, and the gain on coinage a prevailing inducement. The deduction would absorb this gain. A regulation on this point is among the subjects entitled to careful regard, when the whole system is taken up for improvement.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL MOORE.

MINT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Philadelphia, January 28, 1831.

SIR: The information requested in your letter of the 15th, received on the 20th, in regard to the wastage, deposit, and expenses on the coinage of gold and silver; the charges on each metal separately; excluding, but stating the gain on copper for each year since 1815; and also the expenditure on the new mint, will be found in the annexed table, except the particular last mentioned.

The aggregate amount of deposits and coinage of gold and silver is given for each year of the period named, with the aggregate expense thereon, excluding wastage; the annual wastage on both metals, jointly, being also given for the whole period.

A specification of the gold and silver coinage, with the wastage on each, severally, is given only for the last seven years, beginning with 1824; the purpose of comparison, it has been believed, would be satisfactorily attained without extending the analysis further. This will be done, however, with as little delay as may be, if desired. Recent years, it may be remarked, being those of the most abundant coinage, offer the most instructive data.

The irregularity of the proportion of expenditure to coinage occasionally observed, is to be explained by the circumstance, that, within certain years, other than the ordinary expenses were incurred, such as the erection or repair of some building, or the construction of new machinery.

The expenses stated are those sustained by the United States; those paid by depositors, for alloy, refining, &c. when required, are not included.

The expenses of the coinage of gold and silver are unavoidably combined in our accounts, so that the proportion due to each cannot be specified. Our gold coinage has generally been too small to be felt very sensibly in the expenses of the year. It is believed that the expenses of a coinage of three millions of dollars in gold, wastage excepted, would not exceed one-half of one per cent., and that the addition of two millions more would not add more than one-tenth of one per cent. on the additional coinage, wastage excepted. The coinage of three millions in silver, in due proportions, of the various denominations of our coin, may be estimated to cost, wastage excepted, about five-sixths of one per cent., and an addition of two millions more would not, probably, cost more than one-third of one per cent., wastage excepted, on the additional coinage.

There is no charge on the coinage either of gold or silver. Bullion above standard is alloyed, and that below standard is refined, at the expense of the depositor. These preliminary operations place the deposit on a par with one of standard fineness, the coinage of which is free, the depositor receiving in coins the full weight of the standard bullion deposited. This is the inducement by which bullion is solicited to the mint. The United States provides neither gold nor silver for coinage.

The per centage of expense diminishes as the amount coined becomes greater—certain expenses of the establishment being fixed. The coinage of gold and silver for the whole sixteen years is nearly twenty-four millions, or about one and a half millions annually; the expense of which, excluding wastage, will be found to be one and a half per cent. very nearly. The coinage of the last seven years is $15,806,270 50, or $2,258,000, in round numbers, yearly; and the expense thereon, it appears, is one per cent. and a minute fraction. The average coinage of the last two years is $2,714,400, and the expense, excluding wastage, is eighty-nine hundredths of one per cent.

The aggregate wastage of the whole period of sixteen years is twenty-seven and a half hundredths of one per cent. The wastage of the last seven years is twenty-four hundredths of one per cent., that of the silver being twenty-four and a half hundredths, and that of the gold nineteen and a half hundredths of one per cent.

In regard to wastage, it is further to be observed, that a portion of this is from time to time recovered from the broken crucibles, &c. which are carefully reserved for this purpose to a convenient period. During the suspension of business consequent on the late war, the amount of $2,859 39 was thus recovered, and passed to the credit of the United States. Means will be provided in the new mint for triturating the fragments of crucibles and other refuse, and making the recoveries alluded to yearly.

The gain on copper, as stated in the table, is subject to a deduction for the expense of distributing copper coins to all parts of the United States. The amount thus to be deducted may be estimated at about five per cent. on the profit exhibited, thus reducing the whole gain on copper for the last sixteen years to about $86,000. The gain is stated on the books of the mint when the copper for coinage is received. The coinage and distribution, however, may be partially or wholly in the ensuing year. The expense of coining copper is embraced in that of gold and silver.

The profit on copper, estimating from the increased demand for cents, will, probably, in the present year, and on an average of future years, be not less than $10,000, diminishing to that extent the effective charge of the mint establishment.

The sum of the expenditure on the new mint, including the site, is $108,667 64. A few accounts not yet rendered, it is conjectured, may amount to nearly $1,500 in addition to the above.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SAMUEL MOORE.

HON. S. D. INGHAM, Secretary of the Treasury.

A bill regulating the value of certain foreign silver coins within the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, from and after the passage of this act, and for three years thereafter, and no longer, the following silver coins shall pass current as money within the United States, and be a legal tender, by weight, for the payment of all debts and demands, at the rates following, that is to say: The dollars of Mexico, Peru, Chili, Central America, and La Plata, and those restamped in Brazil, of the value of nine hundred and sixty reas, when of not less fineness than ten ounces fifteen pennyweights and twelve grains of pure silver in the troy pound of twelve ounces of standard silver, at one hundred and sixteen cents and one-tenth of a cent per ounce; and the five franc pieces of France, when of not less fineness than ten ounces and sixteen pennyweights in twelve ounces troy of standard silver, at one hundred and sixteen cents and four-tenths of a cent per ounce: Provided, and it is hereby declared, That such tender by weight shall not extend to the payment of any debt or demand for a less sum than one hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause assays of the aforesaid silver coins, made current by this act, to be had at the mint of the United States, at least once in every year, and to make report of the result thereof to Congress.

GOLD COINS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEBRUARY 22, 1831.

Mr. WHITE, of New York, from the select committee on Coins, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act concerning the gold coins of the United States," reported:

That the subject presented to them involves, in its consequences, the highest attribute of sovereignty, the delicate relations which subsist between debtor and creditor, the important interests of industry, and ultimately the value of all property; and emanating from a source entitled to great respect, they have given to it the most mature examination; but finding themselves obliged to dissent from the conclusions at which the Senate have arrived, they now submit the result of their inquiry to the consideration of the House.

The bill from the Senate proposes to alter the standard which has regulated the measure of contracts for nearly forty years. The change intended to be effected is to raise the relative value of gold from 1 for 15, to 1 for 15.9 of silver, equivalent to an alteration of six per centum in the existing standard.

It was judiciously remarked by the distinguished and enlightened statesman who presided over the Treasury Department when the present regulation was adopted by Congress, that "there is scarcely any point in the economy of national affairs of greater moment than the uniform preservation of the intrinsic value of the money unit; on this the security and steady value of property essentially depend."

The committee, duly impressed with the wisdom of that sentiment, feel it incumbent on them to examine, with care and deliberation, the reasons adduced in support of such an important alteration in a regulation of great public interest.

It is alleged in the report of the committee of the Senate—

1st. That "this proportion (1 to 15) was too low a valuation of gold in the year 1792, and much too low a valuation of gold, in relation to silver, at this time."

2d. That, "during the last three hundred years, gold has, with some temporary exceptions, been gradually advancing in value. During the last twenty years, the enhancement of gold in respect to silver has been quite as great as it had ever before been during any equal period; and gold still continues to rise."

3d. That "the general course of our exchanges with Europe is against us; and when remittances cannot be advantageously made by bills, gold is sent to Europe, and especially to Great Britain, so long as gold is not evidently too dear in this country, in comparison with silver. But, in order that both gold and silver should circulate as money, it is necessary that demands for exportation should fall upon both metals, that when a demand for exportation occurs, it should, in general, be as profitable to export one of them as the other; and the relative valuation which will ensure this object, is that which exists when both metals are, or may be, exported with equal profit."

4th. That "much more of the two metals is now coined upon the basis that gold is in value to silver as sixteen to one, than according to any other proportion. If it is expedient to conform our ratio to the existing proportion of any other country, it must be expedient to adopt that proportion which prevails most widely, and the ratio of sixteen to one is now far the most extensive example. A rule so extensive is entitled to respect; but the practical operation of the rule is much more instructive, since it shows that this relative valuation of the two metals secures their concurrent circulation in coins in a very large part of the world."

5th. That "our public coinage of gold is now wholly without any public benefit. If we will not rectify the legal proportion between the coins of the two metals, we ought to abolish the coinage of gold, save the useless expense, and leave gold to be treated like other metals not coined as money."

The recommendations suggested, and the advantages anticipated, are—

1st. That "our system of money, established in the year 1792, fully adopts the principle, that it is expedient to coin and use both metals as money; and such has always been the opinion of the people of the United States."

2d. That "each of the two metals is peculiarly convenient for purposes to which the other is not well adapted. Silver is divisible into pieces of small weight and small value, and is convenient for payments of moderate amount, but is very inconvenient when large sums are paid or transported. And these different advantages cannot be enjoyed without the use of both metals."

3d. "Where the circulating coins are both gold and silver, paper money is less used than it is where all the coins are of silver; and the currency of gold coins in our country will tend to repress this constant tendency to excess of paper money. Our money now in use is bank notes and silver. Bank notes are pressed into every channel of circulation; though no man is legally bound to receive them, they are generally received. So great is the amount of bank notes in circulation, so widely are those notes diffused through our extensive country, and so much is silver banished from circulation, that the option to demand silver is not within the reach of the great body of the people."

"The creditor, and especially the poor man, who can neither wait for payment, nor go to a bank to demand silver, accepts the bank notes which are offered to him, not because he prefers them to silver, but, in a multitude of cases, because he is, in effect, constrained to accept them or nothing. One of many causes which swell this torrent, and impose upon the people a species of necessity to use paper money, is the want of gold coins. The end of coining the two metals is, that they may circulate together; that every person who has coins of either silver or gold, may easily exchange them for coins of the other metal, and that the people may enjoy the advantage of using either species of coins, according to convenience or pleasure."

4th. "Bank notes are frequently received in preference to silver, when gold coins would be more convenient or desirable than bank notes. In such cases, gold would be used if it could be procured, and it should be attainable. To refuse to coin gold for the sake of paper money, or because paper money occupies a place which gold would fill, would be a mischievous error. A bad state of the coins is a great evil; but when such a state of the coins is continued for the purpose of promoting the use of paper money, the end is pernicious, and the means are an abuse of power. Our banks have the right to pay their notes in silver, and they ought not also to enjoy the advantage of an entire banishment of gold coins from the United States. There will surely be sufficient scope for the circulation of bank notes, when the coins which they do not expel from use shall consist partly of both metals; and if it is the interest of the banks that we should have no gold coins, the public interest of the country is, that we should have coins of gold as well as coins of silver."

The regulation proposed will produce, if adopted, a very important alteration in the existing standard of value; and, as it has apparently originated from the views now detailed, which comprise a full consideration of the monetary system of the United States, the committee feel reluctantly compelled to undertake the investigation of an important, difficult, and intricate subject, upon which the most acute and enlightened intellects have disagreed.

This examination will necessarily involve the consideration of general principles, the standard of value, the practice of commercial nations, and a particular reference to the currency of the United States; which various and perplexing questions the committee will endeavor to discuss with all practicable brevity.

Gold and silver are the money of commerce—the merchandise for which all other commodities are freely exchanged by the general consent of mankind. They are the measure of value, and are universally received as the intrinsic equivalent in all exchanges. These precious metals were adopted, and are maintained, as the currency or money of the world, from their being less variable than other metals, and homogeneous in respect to durability and divisibility.

They are, however, exposed to two important variations.

1st. In reference to other commodities, if the mines become more or less productive, or from any cause that will alter the relative proportions which the gold and silver, used as money, bear to that of the aggregate amount, or real value of exchangeable commodities, money price being regulated by these respective proportions: and,

2d. The value of gold in respect to silver is very fluctuating.

Their relative values may vary with the amount of supply furnished by the mines respectively. It will change with the variations in the relative amount of labor expended on the production of these metals. If the quantity produced be appropriated to manufacturing purposes, and as currency, in different relative proportions, at different periods, an alteration in value will ensue; a great diminution, or an extensive increase of demand for either of the precious metals, arising from a change in the usual course of trade, or from an alteration in the circulating medium of a wealthy nation, will produce an important change in their relative value, whether silver be effected, as instanced in the Asiatic trade; or gold, as we have sensibly experienced in our intercourse with England.

Silver, in reference to silver, is unchangeable, and equivalent to the like quantity of fine metal, in all times, and in all countries. It is, besides, universally current; and it is the instrument principally used as the money of commerce.

Gold possesses the same peculiar properties, although it is not so extensively used in effecting exchanges. Either of them are received freely as the money of the world; and each, in a state of purity, preserves its identity and immutability.

Gold and silver, used as a common standard, are, in the nature of things, subject to various and frequent fluctuations; while the regulation of the standard of value, in either metal, is liable to variation only in reference to commodities.

Governments and political economists all agree in opinion as to the necessity or utility of a uniform measure. They, nevertheless, differ, as to the expediency of regulating the standard of value in one or both metals, although the nearer approach to invariableness, in the selection of one metal, is obvious and incontrovertible.

The bill under consideration contemplates such a regulation of the standard as will not only obviate prejudicial variations, but secure such "concurrent circulation in coins" of both metals, "that every person, who has coins of either silver or gold, may easily exchange them for coins of the other metal, and that the people may enjoy the advantage of using either species of coins, according to convenience or pleasure."

The committee would have the greatest pleasure in aiding with their most zealous efforts in the establishment of any regulations calculated to contribute to the convenience or gratification of the community, entertaining, however, serious doubts of the practicability of securing the desirable objects contemplated through the medium of legislative enactments. They think it expedient, as an evidence of their sincere desire to effect a satisfactory and impartial investigation, to note, briefly, the sentiments of some of the most distinguished and eminent writers.

General Hamilton, who was the founder of our present system, distinctly recognised the correctness of the position, that the single standard is the least variable measure, and he was inclined to select gold.

He states that the "inducement to such a preference (one metal) is to render the unit as little variable as possible, because on this depends the steady value of all contracts, and, in a certain sense, of all other property; and it is truly observed, that if the unit belong indiscriminately to both the metals, it is subject to all the fluctuations that happen in the relative value which they bear to each other; but the same reason would lead to annexing it to that particular one which is itself the least liable to variation, if there be, in this respect, any discernible difference between the two.

"Gold may, perhaps, in certain senses, be said to have greater stability than silver, as being of superior value. Less liberties have been taken with it in the regulations of other countries." He was finally of opinion that, "upon the whole, it seems to be most advisable, as has been observed, not to attach the unit exclusively to either of the metals, because this cannot be done effectively without destroying the office and character of one of them as money, and reducing it to the situation of a mere merchandise, which accordingly at different times has been proposed from different and very respectable quarters, but which would probably be a greater evil than occasional variations in the unit, from the fluctuations in the relative value of the metals, especially if care be taken to regulate the proportions between them with an eye to the average commercial value. To annul the use of either of the metals, is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from the comparison of the benefits of a full, with the evils of a scanty circulation."

Sir William Petty, in his posthumous work, published in 1691, is stated to be the first who suggested "that the coin which was to be the principal measure of property ought to be made of one metal only. Money is understood to be the uniform measure and rule for the value of all commodities; that one of the two precious metals is only a fit matter for money; and, as matters now stand, silver is the matter of money."

That profound philosopher, Mr. Locke, thus expresses himself: "I have spoken of silver coin alone, because that makes the money of account and measure of trade all through the world: for all contracts are, I think, every where made, and accounts kept, in silver. I am sure they are so in England, and in the neighboring countries. Silver, therefore, and silver alone, is the measure of commerce. Two metals, gold and silver, cannot be the measure of commerce both together in any country, because the measure of commerce must be perpetually the same, invariable, and keeping the same proportion of value in all its parts. But so only one metal does, or can do, to itself. So silver is to silver, and gold to gold; but gold and silver change their value one to another: for, supposing them to be in value as sixteen to one now, perhaps the next month they may be as fifteen and three-fourths, or fifteen and seven-eighths to one; and one may as well make a measure to be used as a yard, whose parts lengthen and shorten, as a measure of trade of materials that have not always a settled, invariable measure to one another. One metal, therefore, alone, can be the money of account and contract in any country. The fittest for this use, of all others, is silver. Gold, though not the money of the world, and the measure of commerce, nor fit to be so, may, and ought to be coined, to ascertain its fineness and weight; and such coin may safely have a price as well as a stamp set upon it by public authority, so the value set be under the market price."

Lord Liverpool, who was master of the mint in England, and whose system of money is now in practical operation in that country, thus remarks: "Experience has proved, that when coins of two metals are made legal tenders at given rates, those who have any payments to make will prefer to discharge the debt or obligation by paying in that coin which is overrated; and in this manner, gold, being overrated, became the practical currency of England. In the reign of King William, by proclamation, gold guineas, worth but 20s. 8d., were made current at 21s., which, being 4d. more, or 1 19-31 per centum too high, made gold the principal measure or tender in payments." He was of opinion "that the money or coins of any country, which are to be the measure of property, can be made of one metal only;" and that gold was the fittest metal for a rich country like England. He proposed that "the new silver coins shall not be a legal tender for any sum exceeding the nominal value of the largest piece of gold coin in currency. This is the highest state of perfection to which any system of coinage can, in my opinion, be brought." He considered it necessary to exact a heavy seignorage on silver coin, to secure its permanency in circulation; and maintained that such an overvaluation would not prejudice prices. "When the silver coins were the principal measure of property, and were greatly defective, the price of all commodities rose in proportion; but since the gold coins are become the principal measure of property, though our silver coins are on an average as defective as they were before, (about $\frac{1}{3}$), the price of commodities, even when purchased with silver coins, has not risen on account of the defect of these silver coins. The present defective silver coins continue to be paid and received at their nominal value, and according to the rate at which they can be exchanged for our gold coins; sometimes, when they are wanted for particular purposes, they are exchanged even at a premium above their nominal value."

He thought that prices of commodities were "influenced by a defect in that sort of coin only which is the principal measure of property, and in which our balances to foreign countries are regulated and paid."

Mr. Ricardo, who attained well-merited celebrity, in advertising to the English currency, observes: "It appears, then, that whilst each of the two metals was equally a legal tender for debts of any amount, we were subject to a constant change in the principal standard measure of value. It would sometimes be gold, sometimes silver, depending entirely on the variations in the relative value of the two metals; and, at such times, the metal which was not the standard would be melted and withdrawn from circulation, as its value would be greater in bullion than in coin. This was an inconvenience which it was highly desirable should be remedied; but so slow is the progress of improvement, that, although it had been unanswerably demonstrated by Mr. Locke, and had been noticed by all writers on the subject of money since his day, a better system was never adopted till the last session of Parliament, when it was enacted that gold only should be a legal tender for any sum exceeding 42s."

A highly respectable authority, Mr. Gallatin, in his able letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, maintains the superiority of the double standard, and the practicability of keeping both metals in circulation. He instances France as the country "which affords the best and most easy means to ascertain the fact, as it is far the most wealthy country in which both gold and silver coins circulate simultaneously. During the thirteen last years, there has never been a premium on silver coins, and there has almost always been one on gold coins; but it is very rarely, and only for very short periods, that this premium on gold coins has ever fallen below one-fifth, or exceeded four-fifths per cent., and the average is about one-half rather below than above it. The relative value of gold to silver bullion is, therefore, fixed at the rate of 3,091.197, nearly equal to 15.69 to 1. Each metal is brought to the mint in greater or less quantities respectively, according to the fluctuations in their relative market value. But what proves that this ratio does not essentially differ from the true average market relative value, is, that the mint has been abundantly supplied with both for the last twenty-five years, the coinage of France being far greater than that of any other country."

"The present rate (of our gold standard) was the result of information clearly incorrect respecting the then relative value of gold and silver in Europe, which was represented as being at the rate of less than 15 to 1, when it was, in fact, 15.5 to 15.6 to 1. If gold coins are raised by law to their true value, they will not be exported so long as the exchange on London is not above $1\frac{1}{2}$ per centum above the true par, or about $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. nominal, as now calculated. Whenever the exchange is above that rate, there is no means to prevent the exportation; and as the general tendency of our exchanges with Europe is against us, this affords a reason why, in fixing the relative value of the two metals, gold may be a little overrated beyond the ratio deduced from the average premium on French gold coins in France. But this should be done cautiously, as there is always danger in going beyond what the well ascertained facts will warrant." Advertising to Spanish American coins, he observes, in respect to the various rates of premium on doubloons: "This affords no criterion whatever of the relative value of the two metals, as it is exclusively due to the varying demand for the Havana and South American markets, where, by internal regulations, the doubloon is rated never less than \$16, and generally at \$17. This arbitrary order drives, of course, silver from the market, and, without raising, actually, gold to that rate, has, nevertheless, a considerable effect on the price of that particular coin. As there is not in nature any permanent standard of value, it has been objected to the simultaneous circulation of the two metals as a legal tender, that, in addition to the fluctuations in the price of either gold or silver, if only one of the two was made the sole circulating medium, the fluctuations in their relative value increase the uncertainty of the standard. Great Britain, till the year 1797, when the suspension of cash payments took place, and all other nations to this day, have used the two metals simultaneously, without any practical injury, and to the great advantage of the community, though in many instances sufficient care had not been taken to assimilate the legal to the average market value of the two metals—a fact so notorious, so universal, and so constant, is sufficient to prove that the objection, though the abstract reasoning on which it is founded is correct, can have no weight in practice."

In respect to the opinion that the English demand for gold, upon the resumption of specie payments, had suddenly influenced its relative value, it is elsewhere stated, that "any extraordinary demand from a particular country is met without difficulty, or sensibly affecting the price of the metal required." This decisive fact, (the premium in France on gold not having exceeded 1.5 to 1.2 per cent.) "also shows that it is erroneously that the exportation of American gold coins, which commenced in the year 1821, has been ascribed to that extraordinary demand. That exportation has been continued uninterruptedly after that cause had ceased to operate, and, as will be seen hereafter, is due to the alteration from that epoch in the rate of exchanges."

Mr. Tooke, an eminent writer, is inclined to doubt the correctness of the opinion, that the British demand increased the relative value of gold, and he remarks, "these circumstances, collectively," (diminution in the export of silver to Asia, and the emancipation of Spanish America,) "are likely to have increased the supply of silver, and give reason to expect that the fall in the price of silver arose from a relative increase of its quantity and consequent diminution of its value, rather than from a diminished quantity and increased value of gold." He admits, however, that "all information hitherto accessible relating to the proportion of the supply and demand of the precious metals, is vague, and insufficient to build any practical conclusion upon; and the only object of the arguments brought forward is to afford grounds for calling in question the opposite presumption, which, in my opinion, has been much too generally and hastily admitted."

Mr. Tooke thinks that England probably possessed twenty millions of pounds sterling of gold before 1797; the greater part of which, he calculates, would be forthcoming from the hiding places of the hoarders, or from the continent of Europe; "none (gold) being absolutely necessary (on the continent) as the standard or basis of their circulation, which is silver."

Mr. Baring, an eminent banker, and accustomed to pecuniary transactions of the most extensive and various nature, is an advocate of the double standard, in consideration of the peculiar circumstances of England. He asserts that, "if gold and silver were concurrent legal tenders at the old mint regulation, (1 to 15.2,) silver would at present be the practical standard, as the debtor always acquits himself in the cheapest metal he is enabled to do so by law. Gold was his cheapest payment previous to 1797, and, therefore, the practical standard of the country at that time; in consequence of subsequent variations in the price between gold and silver, silver would be so now. The practical currency may change from one metal to another in a short space of time; the fact of gold having been the practical tender in this country under the former system, and that silver would be so if that system continued, is a practical proof of it."

"It will vary with the variations in the relative value of the metals, however wisely you may adjust the difference. The variation in France is seldom above a tenth per cent.: it sometimes runs up to a quarter per cent.: it has been, I am told, something higher on particular occasions. A very slight difference of one-tenth or one-fourth per cent. would determine the use of one metal or another."

"There is no doubt that when this country (England) returned to payments in specie, supposing we wanted from fifteen to twenty millions of pounds, (of gold, for instance,) and that to that extent there was a demand on the rest of the world for gold, gold got an increased value from that circumstance."

"This country partially rejecting gold as its tender, the effect would be to reduce to some extent the value of gold over the rest of the world."

One of his leading motives in recommending the incorporation of silver in the standard, appears to have been an impression, that it was "evident that the Bank, (of England) wishing to reinforce its supply of specie, can do so with infinitely increased facility, with the power of either drawing in gold or silver, than if it were confined to only one of the metals. The choice is already much; but the circumstance that silver is the practical standard of Europe, more than doubles the certainty and facility of procuring a supply."

The substance of Mr. Baring's evidence before the committee of the British Parliament, being subsequently submitted to the consideration of the Bank of England in four queries, the governor and directors of the bank, in part, thus reply.

"1st. Provided there be sufficient currency in the country for the small payments, there does not appear to the bank to be any advantage in the proposed addition of silver as a general legal tender, from the great difficulty of retaining gold as the bulk of the currency under such an arrangement."

"2d. It does not appear that it would afford to the bank any security against combinations to their prejudice, nor would it enable the bank more readily to rectify the foreign exchanges, nor to provide with less difficulty for periods of panic. Neither does it appear to the bank that it would facilitate their procuring, when necessary, supplies of gold from abroad."

"3d. The bank can see no advantage in reverting to the former system of making silver by weight a legal tender to any amount; and they are further of opinion, that a varying scale of value in any metal cannot be otherwise than prejudicial in its effects upon all contracts."

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his masterly and elaborate report to the Senate during the last session, "respecting the relative value of gold and silver, &c.," remarks, in reference to the double standard, "that however exactly the proper equilibrium of values of gold and silver may be adjusted at the mint, the balance is likely to be disturbed by causes which can neither be anticipated nor controlled by political power." And, in the course of his able disquisition, he arrives at the apparently sound and rational conclusion, that the regulation of the measure of value in both metals is inherently defective, and requires to be remedied, and that "this remedy is to be found in the establishment of one standard measure of property only. The proposition that there can be but one standard, in fact is self-evident. The option of Governments charged with this duty, is, therefore, between having property measured sometimes by gold, sometimes by silver, and selecting that metal which is best adapted to the purpose for the only standard. Silver ought to be the standard measure of property in the United States, and maintained by mint regulations as the chief material for metallic currency."

Such discordancy of opinion amongst writers distinguished for profound and philosophical views, and practical knowledge of the subject under consideration, is perplexing and embarrassing.

The committee have endeavored to form a just and impartial estimate of the various principles respectively sustained; and they will now proceed to make some appropriate observations upon them, as general truths, and, also, in reference to the fitness of their application to the existing and peculiar circumstances of the United States.

Gold or silver is the money of commerce, and the measure of value. It is freely received every where as the equivalent in exchange for all other articles. It is, by general consent, the representative of value, the pledge cheerfully taken in fulfilment of bargains, because the receiver knows that he can with it purchase such things as he desires. It is the instrument by which transfers can be most conveniently effected, but it is not the article really wanted.

Commodities are the things actually exchanged and required—provisions, clothing, materials for manufacture, or for other use. Money facilitates exchanges, but its value is in circulation. Commodities are valuable in exchange, and valuable, also, as useful or consumable necessities. The real value of these depends upon the quantity of labor expended upon their production, but not in any degree upon money price, or the quantity of gold or silver required to measure their nominal value, or to effect their exchange. This price or quantity is regulated by the productiveness of the mines, and by the relation which the portion of that product, pending in currency, bears to the aggregate amount of exchangeable merchandise.

Since the discovery of America, the increase of the precious metals has greatly exceeded the relative increase of commodities; gold and silver are estimated to have multiplied in a fourfold ratio.

Money has become so abundant that prices have risen greatly; the labor which was formerly exchanged for one dollar, will now purchase four silver dollars.

This change would seem to indicate a vast increase in the value of labor, and consequently of individual wealth, in the view of those who consider a great deal of money and riches as synonymous; yet it is not perceived in what respect this great increase of gold and silver has influenced the real value of useful commodities. It has sensibly altered the money price of every thing, and thereby diminished its convenience, as the instrument and measure of commerce, by rendering it more cumbrous, requiring four times the quantity or weight of gold or silver to measure the same value, and multiplying in the like ratio the number of coins, and the labor of counting them, without adding, in any manner, to their utility as money, or to their value as property. If one-half of the entire amount of gold and silver now in use was immediately to disappear, or as suddenly to be doubled in its quantity, the consequence would be grievous to debtors, or to creditors; but it is very evident that the real wealth of society would experience no change from either event. The productive power of industry would be neither increased nor diminished; nor would any alteration take place in the utility of its products.

Industry produces commodities, and frugality accumulates capital; but its real value does not depend upon its money value.

Where exchangeable merchandise abounds, gold and silver will be comparatively abundant. Hence, countries, rich in productions, will always have more money circulating than nations which produce fewer commodities. The possession of a large amount of money is the effect, but not the cause of wealth: yet a greater abundance of gold or silver, in rich States, being very visible, it has erroneously been viewed as the cause producing greater wealth; and various projects have been frequently suggested, or adopted, to bring into particular countries more than the natural supply of money, or to manufacture it from other materials than gold or silver. Distinguished statesmen have occasionally countenanced these suggestions; and the value which has been attached to a large supply of the precious metals has been evinced by inflicting severe penalties upon the exporters of gold or silver; in exhibiting indignation against, or questioning the patriotism of such traders as ship away money where its exportation was permitted, by a great solicitude to encourage intercourse with those countries which possess or distribute the produce of the mines; and in denying or questioning the advantage of trading with any nation which required gold or silver in exchange for its merchandise. It has been exhibited in an anxious desire to have the standard of value regulated in both metals, lest the utility of either might be diminished on becoming a commodity, or under the apprehension that the rejection of either gold or silver as a legal tender would contract the field of supply, or inflict the evils of a scanty circulation.

The committee are of opinion that wealth consists in an abundance of necessities, conveniences, and luxuries; that lands, minerals, labor-saving machines, useful commodities, &c. &c. are the constituent parts of national wealth; and that its amount depends upon the skill and industry of its inhabitants.

Industrious and skilful nations will possess a large share of the gold and silver used as money in commerce; but that arises from the superior value of their exchangeable produce.

The value of money is, in an inverse ratio with its quantity, relatively dear or cheap, according to the proportion which the entire amount of gold and silver in circulation bears to the aggregate value of exchangeable commodities. The interest of every nation requires its just proportion of the money of the world; and if commerce was free and unrestrained, its operations would assuredly effect an equitable distribution.

The course is natural and obvious. Redundance raises prices, imports increase, or exports diminish; either consequence creates an adverse exchange; and the superfluous supply of money goes off to other nations, to liquidate balances. On the other hand, scarcity of money lowers prices, increases exports, or brings in money to buy cheap goods. In the nature of things, redundancy or scarcity must be temporary, as mercantile sagacity is ever active and vigilant to profit by the smallest variations in value; and, whilst pursuing gain, it prevents money from undulating greatly, or disadvantageously to the steady occupation of producers.

The correctness of the principle, that money will find its level in the great sea of commerce, unless obstructed by artificial mounds, erected by legislative or local regulations, was forcibly illustrated in the case of France in 1794-'5.

Statesmen of transcendent talents, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Burke, confidently anticipated a complete overthrow of the power of France, from the want of money to carry on warlike operations—the inevitable consequence, as they supposed, of the destruction of the assignat currency. Yet, what is the historical fact? The assignat bubble burst, inflicting, without doubt, a serious amount of individual distress, but the productive power of France being uninjured, and the products of its industry being real wealth, and valuable commodities in exchange. Gold and silver, which is the instrument of exchange, rushed into France in a powerful stream, filling speedily every channel of circulation with its proper, useful, and relative proportion of coin.

Instead of France, with her great wealth, being prostrated and in poverty, as was predicted by these great men, she quickly possessed more gold and silver than any nation in Europe—a result in strict accordance with well established principles in the monetary system.

France possessed a large supply, comparatively, of money, because she was in fact the richest nation in Europe, excepting England, who had forcibly driven gold and silver out of circulation, by substituting bank notes. Considering that these incontrovertible principles, in regard to gold or silver money, have been practically verified in the powerful and instructive example of France, it is truly surprising, that, in subsequent times, complaints should be made of the want of metallic coin, or of a particular kind of the precious metals.

It cannot be the interest of any country, if it were practicable, to possess a greater amount of the precious metals (which are costly merchandise) than its just proportion, because the value of gold or silver, as money, consists altogether in its utility, as an instrument, for effecting exchanges, or for measuring the value of commodities. Its value being relative, and only in exchange, it does not appear to be an important consideration to any country, whether the instrument, which it thus uses as a labor-saving machine in barter, be composed of gold, or of silver, or of both metals.

The committee are induced to believe that every nation will possess its equitable and useful portion of the gold and silver used as money. If they do not repulse it from domestic circulation, by substituting a different medium of exchange, one metal may be selected, with a certain assurance of uniformly possessing, in the metal chosen, such proportion of the entire amount of the money of commerce as their exchangeable commodities bear to the total amount of merchandise produced.

If both metals are preferred, the like relative proportion of the aggregate amount of metallic currency will be possessed, subject to frequent changes from gold to silver, and vice versa, according to the variations in the relative value of these metals.

The currency of the commercial world consisting of gold as well as silver, it is apparently correct and rational to conclude, that the indiscriminate use of both metals must be convenient and advantageous to every community. There is, however, a material distinction between the money of commerce and the money of a particular State, which merits notice. Gold and silver circulate in general commerce as money; but whether they are tendered in new or defaced coins, of the standard of one mint, or a mixture of all mints, or in metal of every variety of form and purity, they are all viewed as bullion, and valued in foreign markets according to the quantity or weight of fine metal.

Whether a nation uses exclusively one metal for its internal trade, or establishes a legal value in both gold and silver, it has been ascertained by experience that one metal only will be the practical standard. Traders will usually find it their interest to carry to each country that description of metal which is the current or exclusive legal tender, because the former is always an overvalued metal, and the latter is of nearly invariable value. The operations of trade being incessant and universal, the value of gold or silver is tested by the estimate of each nation; and an average relative value is thus ascertained and established, with such an approach to accuracy as enables merchants and money dealers, engaged in foreign trade, to effect exchanges freely and securely for the money of commerce, whether tendered in gold or in silver.

But the money of a particular State is the medium of exchange, and measure of value and of contracts, not only for traders and money dealers, but for every member of the community. Public convenience, therefore, requires that it should be coined. Nations generally establish a measure of value, founded upon an ideal unit, or money of account and contract.

Coins, regulated in conformity to this standard, usually compose the metallic currency; and they are generally the only legal tender in payments.

Where gold or silver constitutes the national currency, such a regulation is a matter of great public interest. The stamp set upon the metal is the seal of the State, certifying as to the fineness and weight of the coin, which secures implicit confidence as to its intrinsic value; and the money unit, or its integral parts, or multiples, being exhibited in every coin, facilitates enumeration, exchanges, and payments, and contributes essentially to the convenience and advantage of the public.

The money of a State thus differing in some essential particulars from the money of commerce, the inquiry may be made with consistency and propriety, whether it is most judicious or expedient to regulate the standard in gold, or in silver, or in both metals.

Several of the eminent authorities quoted, including some of those who are practically acquainted with money transactions, strenuously maintain the superior advantages of the double standard, contending,

1st. That, in rejecting either gold or silver, the risk is incurred: "that if the rise is only on one of the metals for which there happens to be a greater demand, and that should be the sole legal tender, it will be exported, and diminish, in a most inconvenient way, the whole amount of specie—a diminution which, in that case, cannot be remedied, by resorting to the other metal which is not a legal tender;" and it is thought to limit the "facility of procuring a supply of gold and silver," and that it causes "the evils of a scanty circulation."

2d. That the rejection of either metal has the effect of "destroying the office and character of one of them as money, and reducing it to the situation of a mere merchandise."

3d. Although it is conceived to be not possible "that any degree of skill or ingenuity, in adjusting the proportions of gold and silver, can be such as to prevent the one or the other from having a preference, and becoming practically, in the course of a short period of years, the currency of the country, almost to the exclusion of the other, except for purposes of convenience," it is, nevertheless, alleged that the hazards from alterations in the measure of contracts, by "those fluctuations in the relative value of the two species of coin, are a quantity which may be neglected;" and it is maintained that "the necessity of occasional adjustment is a small inconvenience, when compared with the great inconvenience of using only one of the metals."

The committee having already expressed their conviction that the operations of commerce, if unimpeded by local and artificial obstacles, will certainly secure to every country its useful and equitable proportion of the money of the world, they feel compelled, reluctantly, to withhold their assent to the opinions preferred in support of the double standard. They cannot admit, that, by rejecting one of the metals, any of the injurious consequences predicted would ensue.

England may be instanced as a practical and forcible exemplification. She has by law recently (and for more than one hundred years previously, in practice) rejected silver as a tender in large payments, and adopted gold (the most costly, and scarce, and least used as money, of the two metals) as the measure and instrument for effecting exchanges. A subsequent act, restraining the issue of bank notes under five pounds sterling, opened an extensive field for circulation, which was immediately filled with gold; and her experience since, notwithstanding the wild and inconsiderate speculations of 1825, may, with that of preceding times, in regard to pecuniary resources, be compared with the means of any other nation to test the accuracy of these disadvantageous allegations against the single standard.

The free city of Bremen, an example on a very different scale of operations, uses gold exclusively, without any known inconvenience.

Hamburg, a neighboring city, of great business and wealth, has for centuries confined commercial payments to silver.

For ten years past we have, in practice, repudiated gold; and it is believed that money has not been more abundant for the same length of time in our commercial history. Our recent practice has in reality reduced gold "to the situation of a mere merchandise," but certainly without injuring its utility as money; for it is picked up with avidity, even in small sums, and exchanged with the greatest readiness for bank notes, redeemable on demand with silver, or effective in instant payments. Its value of course varies according to our pecuniary relations with England, the great market of the world for gold.

If an extensive demand was now to arise for gold, which is "the sole legal tender" in England and Bremen, its export would take place, until scarcity of money was sensibly felt. Commodities would then decline in price, or there would be a diminution of imports, until money found its just and natural level, differing in no perceivable respect from the effects produced, by an adverse balance of payments, upon other States using silver, or which have an established legal tender in both metals. For example, in 1827-'8, we became largely indebted to England and France. Our silver was exported to a great amount, as well as all the gold that could be procured. The banks curtailed their discounts; money became very scarce; we imported comparatively less; the balance was soon liquidated; and we worked through that adverse period with as little difficulty, suffering, or distress, and recovered from its ill effects, as speedily as on any of the many previous occasions that we have encountered the ebbs in commerce; although the increased value of gold had, in effect, rejected it from circulation, and deprived us of the power alleged to be remediate of "resorting to the other metal, which is not a legal tender."

Our own experience, and that of other nations, thus appearing to confirm in practice the accuracy of the principles previously deduced, the committee cannot resist the conviction that the regulation of a national standard in gold, or in silver, or in both metals, will not, in any respect, influence the pecuniary resources of a State, or contribute any relief whatever in periods of exigency. Unfavorable balances with foreign countries must be discharged with gold or silver, or commodities. Debtor nations, not possessing mines of the precious metals, must regulate their imports according to the exchangeable value of their surplus produce. They have no other means of purchasing money, or other foreign merchandise. The ill effects of bad seasons, and other unusual and adverse events, which occasion temporary pressure, are soon rectified by industry and frugality.

The great and inherent defect in the double standard, that has produced the evil of which we now complain, (the disappearance of gold,) and which has invited the remedy of a new adjustment of its relative value, is deserving of particular and grave consideration.

It has been already remarked, that the capacious mind which delineated the system of money adopted by Congress, expressed a strong desire "to render the unit as little variable as possible, because on this depends the steady value of all contracts, and, in a certain sense, of all other property." He was well aware "that if the unit belong indiscriminately to both metals, it is subject to all the fluctuations that happen in the relative value which they bear to each other."

He appears to have been strongly inclined to select gold as the only measure of value; and the difficulty which he experienced in arriving at the final conclusion to recommend both metals, is clearly evidenced by the undecided terms in which it is announced: "But, upon the whole, it seems to be most advisable," &c. The obvious advantages of the single standard having yielded to the preponderant influence of an apprehension that the rejected metal would be injured, as money, by "reducing it to the situation of a mere merchandise," and that "to annul the use of either of the metals as money, is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full, with the evils of a scanty circulation"—evils which were sensibly experienced at that time, whatever causes may have produced them, subsequent experience, and particularly that of the last ten years, having furnished strong reasons to doubt if the cause of those evils was accurately conjectured. The committee are induced, from that circumstance, to believe that the views which they have now expressed do not differ essentially from an authority so deservedly entitled to their respect.

There does not appear to be any diversity of opinion as to one radical defect in the double standard—the unavoidable necessity of occasional adjustments, or, in other words, of alterations in the measure of value and of contracts. The effects of these changes are variously estimated. A large majority of the writers quoted maintain that the over-rated metal will always be "the practical currency, [which] may change from one metal to the other in a short period of time. Gold was his cheapest payment, and, therefore, the practical standard of the country (England) at that time. In consequence of subsequent variations in the price between gold and silver, silver would be so now, as the debtor always acquires himself in the cheapest metal he is enabled to do so by law.

"Whilst each of the two metals was equally a legal tender for debts of any amount, we were subject to a constant change in the principal measure of value."

"Experience has proved, that when coins of the two metals are made a legal tender at given rates, those who have any payments to make will prefer to discharge the debt or obligation, by paying in that coin which is over-rated."

The Secretary of the Treasury justly remarks, that "if the ratio is so adjusted as to maintain both metals, for the time being, in equilibrium, subsequent fluctuations may expel that which is most necessary to the currency."

These opinions, which in times past were theories for our meditation, are now realized in practice. To use the language of a highly distinguished and learned Senator, Mr. Webster, "The English standard of value is gold; with us, that office is performed by gold, and by silver also, at a fixed relation to each other: but our estimate of silver is rather higher, in proportion to gold, than most nations give it; it is higher especially than in England at the present moment.

"The consequence is, that silver, which remains a legal currency with us, stays here, while the gold has gone abroad, verifying the universal truth, that if two currencies be allowed to exist, of different values, that which is cheapest will fill up the whole circulation."

It is, however, on the other hand, alleged, "that these fluctuations are a quantity which may be neglected;" "that Great Britain, till the year 1797, when the suspension of cash payments took place, and all other nations to this day, have used the two metals simultaneously, without any practical injury, and to the great advantage of the community;" and it is also maintained, that "the practical operation of the rule (gold to silver, one to sixteen) is much more instructive, since it shows that this relative valuation of the two metals secures their concurrent circulation in coins in a very large part of the world."

The semblance of disagreement amongst these writers as to realities, induces the supposition, that the expressions, "all other nations to this day have used the two metals simultaneously," "that this relative valuation of the two metals secures their concurrent circulation in coins," should likely be construed, in the restricted sense of a legal right, to tender them indiscriminately in payments.

The committee are not qualified by experience to pronounce with decision as to the usages, or the respective advantages, of the money systems of other nations; but, upon a deliberate and candid consideration of the various statements submitted, and a careful examination of many valuable documents, particularly those furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, they are inclined seriously to question the practicability of devising any regulation of the standard, which will accomplish the desirable object of the bill, so that "every person who has coins of either silver or gold may easily exchange them for coins of the other metal; and that the people may enjoy the advantage of using either species of coins, according to convenience or pleasure."

The committee cannot doubt that the following facts are satisfactorily established by the concurrent testimony of the respectable evidence adduced.

1st. That gold was the practical standard of England from 1717 till 1797, in consequence of its being the overrated or cheapest metal, though the proportions were only 1 for 15.2 of silver, and silver coins were a legal tender by tale until 1774, and by weight subsequently.

2d. "That silver is the practical standard (of the continent) of Europe," "none (gold) being absolutely necessary (on the continent) as the standard or basis of the circulation, which is silver," although several nations regulate the measure of value in both metals, and with such accuracy that the premium on gold "in France is seldom above a tenth per cent., and sometimes runs up to a quarter per cent."

3d. That gold is the money of contract in "Havana and South America," because it is overrated, and "this arbitrary order drives of course silver from the market."

The simple fact, that gold bears a premium in France and in the United States, and silver in Havana and in South America, appears to furnish incontrovertible evidence that the metal thus undervalued does not circulate concurrently or simultaneously with the overrated metal. If currency thus discriminated produces in its operations that description of concurrent circulation contemplated by the passage of this bill, the result does not conform to the proverbial acuteness of money dealers and traders. They are not in the habit of paying a premium, however minute, for what can be obtained freely without charge; and that which is "concomitant in agency," or acting together "in general circulation," must be supposed to be within the reach of every man. Judging by our own experience in relation to this point, it is manifest that a premium on gold has banished it entirely from circulation; that the periodical demand for dollars in former times, for Asia, had, during its continuance, the like effect upon silver; and that, in 1827 and 1828, a premium of one-half to one per cent. on Spanish dollars, or those of the new American States, withheld them altogether from public use, although they constituted the great bulk of the specie fund of the United States.

The difference in value, indicated by small premiums, may not prejudice contracts of ordinary amount; but all experience testifies, that the customary currency of a State may be changed, to the great inconvenience of the uninformed portion of the community, by the slight inducement of a small fraction of a per cent. profit.

Sir Isaac Newton relates, that louis d'ors of France, worth but 17s. 0½d. sterling, became current in England at 17s. 6d., and, upon being forbidden, at his instance, to pass for more than 17s. they were immediately brought into the mint to the amount of £1,400,000 sterling; at another time moidores were current in the West of England at 28s., which were intrinsically worth 27s. 7d., and the country was full of them. Upon orders being issued that the public receivers should take them at 27s. 6d. only, they disappeared immediately. A profit of 2½ per cent. brought in plenty of louis d'ors, and the loss of three-eighths per cent. drove them out of circulation; 1½ per cent. profit brought in the moidores, and three-tenths per cent. loss made them disappear entirely. "It was (then) evident (as we know now) that they who traffic in coins will trade for a very small profit."

Besides the inconvenience of frequent changes in an instrument so incessantly used as money, fluctuations will occasionally occur, such as we wish at present to remedy, that have a detrimental influence on contracts; for instance, a sale made on credit, in 1820, to the amount of ten dollars, was, according to our legal standard, and in equity, an agreement, by implication, that the seller should receive in payment 3,712½ grains of silver, of the value of 247½ grains of gold. If this contract terminated in 1821, it would have been discharged with ten silver dollars, which could have been purchased with 238½ grains of gold; and if the bargain had not expired until 1822, the payment might have been effected with 230 grains of gold, being a reduction in the first case of three and five-eighths per cent., and in the latter instance of fully seven per cent., from the amount agreed upon by tacit stipulation; and, consequently, a departure from the spirit of the agreement, and a violation of contract, though sanctioned by the letter of the law. If the standard should be regulated on the basis proposed in this bill, 233½ grains of gold will be equivalent to ten silver dollars. Suppose that, before the termination of a similar contract, an important demand for silver for Asia, or elsewhere, should suddenly arise, or that the British Government should return, in compliance with powerful solicitations, to the standard of value in force previous to 1819, which measure Mr. Baring thinks would reduce the value of gold 3½ per cent., will not the payer then discharge his debt in gold, and realize 3½ per cent., or whatever may be the amount of profit, resulting from the influence of unforeseen contingencies upon the relative value of these metals? Is it judicious, or consistent with a high and just regard for the equitable discharge of obligations, to expose pending contracts to the hazard of prejudicial vicissitudes, from causes beyond the national control?

Is there any thing in the ordinary course of events which justifies a legal regulation, that, under every change, must operate to the prejudice of the seller?

Are not buyers and sellers, in the free exercise of private judgment, on a perfect footing of equality, as to chances of benefit from a bargain, or as to claim for legislative protection? And if so, why should the law be framed on such a principle as to act uniformly in favor of the purchaser?

What are the compensative inducements to maintain regulations so obviously obnoxious to animadversion? The committee are obliged to acknowledge, after the most attentive and deliberate investigation, that, if correspondent advantages really appertain to this system, they must confess their inability to discover them.

It seems to be universally admitted that the regulation of the standard in one metal is the nearest practicable approach to invariableness, and that every attainable degree of uniformity is highly desirable. If the only legal tender in payments were dollars, each containing 371½ grains of fine silver, or 24½ grains of fine gold, the measure would be in quantity as invariable as a foot of twelve inches; and once established as the national standard, no alteration or interference on the part of Congress would ever afterwards be required. Silver being to silver, and gold to gold, identical and invariable, either of them may and will change in its relative value to commodities, as has been already stated, in the event of a material variation in its cost at the mines, or from a great alteration in the aggregate amount of exchangeable merchandise; but such important changes are of rare occurrence, or of too slow and gradual growth, to prejudice contracts during their usual term of pendency. Whatever might be the relative value of gold to silver, or however frequent their fluctuations, the standard measure in one metal would be unaffected; 371½ grains of silver would never cease to be equal to the like quantity of the same metal. National produce would be estimated and exchanged in conformity to this measure, and contracts would be discharged in accordance with the strict letter of the law, and the fair and equitable construction of the agreement.

The public would have the gratification of using the coin to which custom and convenience will have attached them. Foreign nations would not have an opportunity to withdraw one description of our currency, and to replace it with the other, to their profit; nor would it be ever necessary to entertain and discuss this very intricate and controverted subject, or to deliberate on the passage of a bill which contemplated an important and serious change in the money unit, upon the invariableness of which the steady value of property essentially depends. The alteration in the quantity of gold, representing ten dollars, from 247½ grains to 233½ grains, is an actual reduction of six per cent. from the previously existing and long prevailing measure of contracts. Surely a change of such important character should not be made, unless deeply interesting to the public welfare; for, as General Hamilton has wisely and appositely remarked, "the quantity of gold and silver in the national coins, corresponding with a given sum, cannot be made less than heretofore, without disturbing the balance of intrinsic value, and making every acre of land, as well as every bushel of wheat, of less actual worth than in time past."

As it may, however, be the pleasure of the Legislature to attempt an effectual adjustment of the relative value of gold, some inquiry into the causes producing this necessity may be appropriate.

Lord Liverpool, Mr. Baring, and Mr. Ricardo, state, the practical currency of England, from 1717 till 1797, was gold, in consequence of its being the overvalued metal relatively, and the cheapest payment, although, during that period, the established standard was but 15.2 of silver for 1 of gold.

The legal value of the guinea was fixed, in 1717, by the recommendation of Sir Isaac Newton, the master of the mint, at 21s. sterling each, which price he estimated to be 4d. or one and five-eighths per cent. higher than its average value in commerce.

The quotation of prices of bullion in the London market, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury since 1760, corroborates the opinion, that gold was overvalued in the mint regulations; the prices of gold and silver during ten years of profound peace, from 1783 until 1792, are upon an average in the relative proportions of 1 of gold for 14.76 of silver, indicating a premium of about three per cent. on silver; and it is worthy of notice, that, in the year 1785 alone, did the market price of gold conform to the legal standard.

It does not appear that there was any export of gold from the United States, of consequence, from 1792 till 1821—a period of such extraordinary commercial vicissitudes, that exchange must have occasionally been unfavorable. The relative legal value during that time was only 15 of silver for 1 of gold; and silver having been frequently at a premium of one to three per cent., gold could of course have been obtained without difficulty. Such respectable opinions and confirmatory circumstances, connected with the fact that England has long been the great market for gold, seem to authorize the inference that General Hamilton did not undervalue gold in 1792.

The coinage of France in 1785-'6, having been regulated at 1 of gold for 15½ of silver, exhibits a material difference in the estimate of value in that country. It may, however, be observed, that some period of tranquillity, and of public confidence, as well as an adverse balance of payments with other nations, is necessary to test the accuracy of such regulations. Internal dissatisfaction, loss of public credit, revolutionary movements, failure in paper currency, domestic or foreign wars, influence materially the relative value of gold to silver, in consideration of the comparative portableness of gold, for concealment, or for facilitating military operations; one or other of these extrinsic causes influenced, in some degree, the pecuniary regulations of France, from 1785-'6 till 1816. The fact that gold, in France, did not command a premium of more than one-half per cent. "during the four years which immediately followed the resumption of specie payments in England," cannot, it is conceived, be considered "a conclusive proof that it could not at most have enhanced the price of gold more than three-tenths per cent., since, in that case, the advance would also have taken place in France, whence, in fact, a considerable portion of that demand was supplied." The proof is admitted to be conclusive as to the actual value of gold in France; but it must be recollected, that if the balance of payments between England and France was about equal, and there cannot be much preponderance where the currency is metallic, the charges of transportation must in such case be added, in order to ascertain the English value. Suppose that the proportions in French coin are equal to 1 for 15.7 of silver, if a premium of three-tenths per cent., probable deficiency in the weight of circulating coin one-half per cent., and insurance, freight, &c. one-half per cent., be added, it would place gold in England at the high relative rate of 1 for 15.9 of silver, equivalent to a premium of six per cent. upon our mint price. That the demand for gold was sensibly experienced in France at that period, may be inferred from a statement of the gold coined at the mints of France, according to Mr. Tooke: In 1818, the amount was 126 millions of francs; in 1819, 52 millions; in 1820, 28 millions; and in 1821, when the British demand was active, the coinage of gold in France nearly ceased, being only four hundred thousand francs in that year.

If the statement of the relative amounts of supply of the precious metals is entitled to any confidence, the increase in the production of gold since the commencement of revolutionary movements in Spanish America, in 1810, must have fully compensated the reduction in the demand for silver in Asia.

If the value of gold had risen from an increase of cost at the mines, which it is reasonable to conclude constitutes its real value, that increase of value would doubtless have been distinctly exhibited in England antecedent to 1797; and since, in general commerce, whether England had returned to specie payments or not, there were certainly no indications that gold was rated too low in our standard of 1 to 15 earlier than 1821, when the English demand commenced. The fact of concomitance in events is not relied upon as a proof of effective agency; but a great demand for gold and an increased relative value for gold being coeval circumstances, and in accordance with the universally admitted principle that a new or sudden increase of demand will enhance prices, it appears to be a natural and rational inference, that the British demand for gold was the cause of increasing its value in respect to silver.

Mr. Baring thinks "there is no doubt that when this country (England) returned to payments in specie, supposing we wanted fifteen to twenty millions of pounds of gold, for instance, and that to that extent there was a demand on the rest of the world for gold, gold got an increased value from that circumstance."

Mr. Tooke admits, that, at first, he coincided in this opinion, but, subsequently, he was inclined to question this "presumption, (which, in my opinion, has been much too generally and hastily admitted,)" chiefly on the ground that the supply of silver has actually increased; a conclusion which is not sanctioned by any authentic record within the knowledge of the committee, and at variance with the effects usually produced by revolutions and sanguinary civil wars, in any country, upon the amount of its staple commodity for exportation.

The annual product of gold for coinage, and for manufactures, is not estimated to exceed two millions of pounds sterling. Whether England required from foreign nations twenty, fifteen, or even ten millions of pounds, the magnitude of either amount could scarcely fail to have an important influence on the relative value of the precious metals. If the aggregate quantity of gold and silver, used as money, was unchangeable, the suspension or resumption of specie payments, by any great nation, would influence the money prices exclusively, and but slightly or temporarily disturb the relative value of the metals; but when it is well known that the precious metals are purchased in vast quantities for other purposes than money, it seems reasonable to conclude that a sudden demand for gold, as money, equivalent to five, eight, or ten years of the entire produce of the gold mines of the world, must necessarily, in competition with the manufacturing demand, enhance its value in reference to silver. If it could be clearly demonstrated (which may be questioned) that the rise in gold, in 1821, has been fully maintained since, the committee are not prepared to admit that this circumstance would controvert their position, because the vacuum created by such an immense draught on other nations cannot be speedily filled. The bullion market of England has been more fluctuating than might be expected, if the rise was the result of increased cost in the production of gold. The quotations adverted to furnish the following result:

Gold Coins.

1821,	Average relative value 1 of gold, for	15.92
1823,
1824,	Average relative value 1 of gold, for	15.65
1825, 1826,
1827,	Average relative value 1 of gold, for	15.75
1828,
1829,
1830,	Average relative value 1 of gold, for	15.94
	Average relative value 1 of gold, for	15.78

But, admitting the uncertainty of estimates or predictions as to the present or future amount of supply of the precious metals respectively, it may nevertheless not be irrelevant to remark, that, as the exploration of new mines of great promise speedily become matters of notoriety, and as universal experience has established the fact that mines long and deeply worked become less productive, it may be fairly concluded that the amount of silver annually furnished is not upon the increase; whilst, on the other hand, we have positive evidence of a rapid increase (as yet, to be sure, not comparatively on a great scale) in our own country, in the production of gold from mines represented to be of great territorial extent, and of encouraging and fruitful appearance.

After an attentive consideration of the circumstances connected with the rise of gold, the possible contingencies, and the prospects as to amount of supply, the committee are of opinion that its present relative valuation in commerce is not likely to be maintained; and they, therefore, cannot recommend the adoption of the value proposed, that of 1 for 15.9 of silver.

If they were well persuaded that the rise will be permanent, it would not change their sentiments in regard to the inexpediency of attaching a price to gold higher than its average rate in the commercial world. When coins circulated freely in the United States, silver composed the chief part of the currency; it has at all times formed a large portion of our specie fund: our money unit was founded upon the computed value of a Spanish silver dollar. It has ever been the actual or implied measure of contracts. Silver is the money to which we have been accustomed; and it is, also, generally speaking, the money of commerce. Public and mercantile convenience uniting in favor of silver as coin, it would appear to be highly injudicious to hazard the loss of our silver, by elevating the value of gold even to its average rate in commerce.

The committee are finally of opinion that the rate proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of 1 of gold for 15.625 of silver, is the utmost limit to which the value can be raised, with a due regard to a paramount interest—the preservation of our silver as the basis of circulation.

The committee have not overlooked the fair claims of our own gold miners; and they will now proceed to show that the decision against a high estimate is in no degree injurious to their interest.

Mr. Crawford, in his much esteemed report on currency, makes the following sensible and important observation: "If paper can be made to circulate, independent of its employment in the transmission of funds, gold and silver to the same extent will be exported. If paper will be received and employed generally as the medium of exchange, and especially if it is issued in bills of small denominations, the amount of specie which will be exported will be great in proportion to the paper in circulation. If this position be correct, the power of Congress will be insufficient to retain any considerable portion of gold or silver in the United States."

These opinions are so decisive as to the inutility of legislative regulations, with the view of placing and maintaining gold and silver coin in general circulation, that the committee will try their accuracy by the convictive if not infallible test of our own experience.

It may be affirmed that our currency, at the adoption of the constitution, was almost entirely composed of gold and silver money; the Bank of North America was in operation, but its notes had not likely much circulation. In 1791, the first Bank of the United States was instituted; but it is presumed that its issues were neither very great, nor perhaps intended to be of that denomination which passes easily into wide circulation, as General Hamilton, who projected that institution, was of opinion that "bank circulation is desirable rather as an auxiliary to, than as a substitute for, that of the precious metals." It is believed, that, so lately as the year 1800, coin constituted the bulk of the circulation, and was the chief instrument used for effecting exchanges of small amount. Bank notes were rarely seen south of the Potomac, or west of the mountains; and having had probably a restricted circulation in the interior of any State, it is not unlikely but that the people of the United States, until that period, (banks being too few and distant to be used as general depositories,) did enjoy the advantage of "using either species of coins, according to convenience or pleasure."

Subsequently, banks increased in rapid succession; public confidence and convenience facilitated the issue of their notes; and bank bills very soon ejected gold and silver coins from every channel of circulation which the denomination of the notes were adapted to fill. Notwithstanding this extensive substitution of paper in place of coin, gold and silver circulated partially until the war. It is not known correctly when the emission of notes under five dollars commenced; but presuming that few of that denomination were issued before the war, it is evident that a considerable amount of gold and silver was necessary to the public convenience, and, being necessary, it was no doubt possessed. The notes of local banks generally do not circulate freely beyond the limits of their State; and the first Bank of the United States having issued no bills of a lower denomination than ten dollars, travelling expenses, and other objects of distant disbursement, created a considerable demand for gold or silver, whilst the vast variety of minor expenditures under five dollars must have retained in circulation a large amount of Spanish or American dollars.

It is a reasonable and moderate estimate to suppose that a population of seven and a half millions, in 1811, required, for the purposes recited, not less than seven or eight millions of gold and silver coin, independent of the integral parts of a dollar, wanted as change. Silver dollars were of necessity in circulation, as there was no substitute, and gold was probably more abundant than was indispensable to public convenience; being the overrated metal, it was no doubt paid out by the banks, in order to check the exportation of silver, or to realize a profit on its sale. The dissolution of the Bank of the United States occasioned a great increase of local institutions; war soon succeeded, specie payments were suspended, and the whole country was inundated with notes from one-sixteenth part of a dollar upwards, to the entire exclusion of the precious metals.

After the banks resumed specie payments, silver continued to be occasionally in demand for exportation, at a premium. Gold being consequently the cheapest metal, composed a considerable portion of the specie fund; and it was tendered and paid out by the banks in preference to silver, until the year 1821, when the English demand commenced. Since that time, gold has disappeared entirely from circulation, and also from the vaults of the banks. The resumption of cash payments did not restore our circulation to the footing of 1811. Five dollar notes have been constantly issued by the present Bank of the United States, and notes of one, two, and three dollars, circulate in a great majority of the States, to the exclusion of silver, except as change.

This brief statement exhibits the progressive alterations in our currency, from coin to bank notes, issuing, finally, in a paper circulation, (redeemable on demand with specie,) and no coin above the fractional parts of a dollar—a result which illustrates and verifies the assertion of Mr. Crawford, that, “if paper will be received and employed generally as the medium of exchange, and especially if it is used in bills of small denomination,” it will be impracticable “to retain any considerable portion of gold or silver in the United States.” The current of business which inevitably produces this effect, is well understood, or easily explained. The advantages enjoyed by a bank over an individual money lender, arises from such general confidence in its solidity as induces the depositee, for safe keeping, of the surplus funds of the community, and the reception of its notes as money. These are the sources of profit beyond the use of its capital, and of these the chief is usually its issues. Banks not only hold the surplus funds of the society, and furnish the circulating medium, but every payment and receipt of magnitude is made through their agency. The entire currency of the United States is thus constantly flowing into the banks, and out again into general circulation.

If the profit of these institutions depends materially upon the emission of their paper, is it likely, is it reasonable, to expect that they will ever voluntarily make payments in coin? If money is not much wanted, the issue of notes strengthens their vaults, and places them in an attitude to meet with facility the first improvement in business. If money is in fair demand, will not the desire to realize large profits keep their specie as low as prudence will authorize, and cause them to regard with solicitude its emission? Is it not obvious that their interest presents, constantly, a strong inducement to avoid the disbursement of specie? Have we not all experienced, or heard of the reluctance with which banks part with coin? And is it not well known, that when money is in demand, instead of meeting a call for specie with cheerfulness and accommodation, the general desire and practice is to tender that description of coin which the applicant does not want? If gold is demanded, will not silver be tendered, and the reverse?

This course of business is in accordance with the nature of the vocation; and it is not mentioned with the slightest disposition to imply censure or disapprobation, but to show, in the practical operation of our money system, the inefficacy of any measure to increase the circulation of gold or of silver, whilst bank notes retain the public confidence, and are issued of small denominations.

The legal authority to regulate the currency of the United States was one of the powers granted to Congress by the constitution; but its practical efficiency is exercised exclusively by the banks. The money used by the people of the United States for every object of internal trade, is bank bills. The specie basis, which sustains the circulation, is regulated in its amount according to the pleasure or discretion of the issuers of the paper. The notes are redeemable on demand in coin; but that liability, however beneficial as a security, has no effect upon the composition of the circulating medium. Any sum demanded will be promptly obtained, for concealment, or manufacture, or for exportation; but whatever may be the amount of specie withdrawn from the bank for other purposes, the circulation of coin is but momentarily increased, as the strong current of payments speedily carries it back to the banks, whose interest it is to reissue a less costly substitute.

The committee have thus minutely examined the course of banking operations, in order to show, as they conceive, that if “bank notes are pressed into every channel of circulation,” so “diffused through our extensive country, and so much is silver banished from circulation, that the option to demand silver is not within the reach of the great body of the people;” yet it does not appear how this difficulty would be removed by the coinage of gold. Congress can establish such a relative value for gold, as would soon convert all the silver in the vaults of the banks into that metal; but it is apprehended that “the power of Congress will be insufficient” to force gold into circulation, while five and ten dollar notes are issued and sustained in circulation by public confidence.

Cordially concurring in the justice and propriety of the remark, that “a bad state of the coins is a great evil; but when such a state of the coins is continued for the purpose of promoting the use of paper money, the end is pernicious, and the means are an abuse of power,” the committee nevertheless cannot perceive wherein the legislative authority can be exercised, under existing circumstances, so as to improve or alter the domestic circulation.

Leaving out of view the past year, during which the balance of payments with other nations has been unusually in our favor, it is questionable if the total amount of specie, generally, in the United States, has much exceeded the amount possessed nearly thirty years ago, although population has more than doubled, and wealth has increased in a much greater ratio. The amount of silver in circulation, of which a half dollar is the highest denomination, is estimated at five to eight millions; the former is likely the most accurate conjecture, as a large majority of the States, including those which have made the greatest progress in commerce and manufactures, use notes of one, two, and three dollars. According to a statement entitled to respect, the circulation of the State banks on the 1st January, 1830, deducting the notes of other banks on hand, was about thirty-six millions of dollars; of which the notes under five dollars amounted to something less than five millions, the specie about thirteen millions, the nett issues of the Bank of the United States were about thirteen millions, its specie seven millions—total circulation nearly fifty millions of dollars of notes, and five millions of silver, with a reserved fund of twenty millions of dollars, held by the banks.

As these issues are sustained in circulation by public opinion, the community must be satisfied with their safety and convenience, or the power which sustains would promptly be withdrawn. We have commerce and wealth enough to bring and buy the precious metals, as well as many other luxuries that we purchase; and we may therefore be considered as exemplifying in part the general opinion of Mr. Lowndes, in regard to paper currency and the precious metals, who states in his report on coins, that “wherever trade has existed without the paper, specie has been abundant, and scarce always where the paper has existed, either with or without the trade: we must conclude, that when precious metals become scarce, while the price of foreign and domestic productions continues high, their scarcity results not from the country being unable to procure or retain them, but from its choosing to employ a substitute for their use.”

It has, however, been suggested by a highly respectable authority, frequently adverted to, that “Congress may, if it deems proper, lay a stamp duty on small notes, which will put an end to their circulation;" and it has also been proposed, "in order to bring gold more generally into circulation, that all notes under the denomination of ten dollars might be suppressed." "The reduction in the amount of the paper currency, arising from a suppression of the small notes, may be estimated at six or seven, and that produced by the suppression of the five dollar notes at about eight millions. Both together would probably lessen the paper currency by one-fourth, and substitute silver and gold coins in lieu thereof."

The partial introduction of gold and silver coins into general circulation would, no doubt, render our current medium a more certain and stable measure of exchange, and contribute to the gratification of those who prefer coins to paper. The committee are not insensible of the advantages thus proposed; and if circumstances authorized any effectual change, they would readily concur in such measures of melioration as expediency might suggest. They are of opinion that the wages of labor, and the produce which small farmers pass immediately to the consumers, might, with advantage and propriety, be paid in coin, on the ground that this industrious and deserving class, who derive no benefit from the credit system, should not encounter any risk in the medium of payment.

An alteration of this nature would open an extensive home market to our miners, as gold might then be coined at such a regulation of value as would secure its permanency in circulation; and if it were limited to effect the small payments noted, it would not expose our silver to hazard, nor would such a measure as is apprehended raise prices injuriously, it having been ascertained by long experience in England, that "this rise is influenced by a defect in that sort of coin only which is the principal measure of property, and in which our balances to foreign countries are regulated and paid;" for, as Mr. Ricardo remarks, "the silver currency was, during a great part of this period, (a long period previous to 1797,) very much debased; but it existed in a degree of scarcity, and therefore, on the principle which I have before explained, it never sunk in its current value."

But there will be time enough to ascertain distinctly the public opinion in regard to alterations of important character, before it will be in the power of Congress to interfere with efficiency.

Independent of other existing difficulties, the committee entertain the decided conviction that the public faith solemnly guaranties to the proprietors of the Bank of the United States the privilege to issue notes of five dollars.

The numerous reports and official statements which have been made to Congress upon coins and currency, abundantly testify that some dissatisfaction has long subsisted in regard to our circulating medium.

The committee, therefore, were of opinion, that, however tedious a minute disquisition upon a subject of such intricacy might appear, it was their duty to effect a complete investigation.

Notwithstanding the notoriety of great discordancy of views prepared the committee to encounter the difficulty of making an election amongst authorities of equal eminence and capacity, yet it has been the cause of much regret that their conclusions have oftentimes differed from the sentiments of those for whose judgment they entertain high respect.

The committee have carefully collated the diverse opinions of many writers of great distinction and celebrity, upon this complicate and controvertible subject; and having engaged in its examination with unprejudiced minds, and an earnest desire to arrive at just views of general principles, and of their beneficial adaptation to the peculiar circumstances of the United States, they will now conclude their report with a recapitulation of their deliberations and investigations.

1st. That the operations of commerce will assuredly dispense to every country its equitable and useful proportion of the gold and silver in currency, if it is not repulsed by paper, or subjected to legal restrictions.

2d. That it cannot be of essential importance to any State, whether its proportion of the money of commerce thus distributed consists of gold, or of silver, or of both metals, it being the instrument of exchange, but not the commodity really wanted.

3d. That there are inherent and incurable defects in the system, which regulates the standard of value in both gold and silver: its instability as a measure of contracts, and mutability as the practical currency of a particular nation, are serious imperfections; whilst the impossibility of maintaining both metals in concurrent, simultaneous, or promiscuous circulation, appears to be clearly ascertained.

4th. That the standard being fixed in one metal, is the nearest approach to invariableness, and precludes the necessity of further legislative interference.

5th. That gold and silver will not circulate promiscuously and concurrently for similar purposes of disbursement, nor can coins of either metal be sustained in circulation with bank notes, possessing public confidence, of the like denominations.

6th. That if the national interest or convenience should require the permanent use of gold eagles and their parts, and also of silver dollars, the issue of bank bills of one, two, three, five, and ten dollars, must be prohibited.

7th. That if it should hereafter be deemed advisable to maintain both gold and silver coins in steady circulation, and to preserve silver as the measure of commerce and of contracts, gold must be restricted to small payments.

8th. That if it is the intention to preserve silver as the principal measure of exchange, permanently and securely, it will be necessary to estimate the relative value of gold under its present average, or probable future value in general commerce.

Influenced by these considerations, the committee recommend that the standard value of gold be regulated according to the ratio of 1 of gold for 15 625-1000 of silver; and that the portion of alloy hereafter used in coinage be established at one-tenth, and therefore submit the following amendments to the bill from the Senate.

	Grains, fine gold.	Grains, standard gold.

INTERCOURSE WITH THE DANISH WEST INDIES.

Message from the President of the United States, transmitting copies of a correspondence between the Secretary of State and the minister of Denmark, in relation to the commercial intercourse between the said States and the Danish West India islands, &c.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith to Congress the copy of a correspondence which lately passed between Major General Von Scholten, his Danish Majesty's Governor General of his West India possessions, and special minister to the United States, and Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State, concerning the regulation of the commercial intercourse between those possessions and the United States, which comprehends the propositions that General Von Scholten made to this Government, in behalf of his sovereign, upon that subject, and the answers of the Secretary of State to the same; the last showing the grounds upon which this Government declined acceding to the overtures of the Danish envoy.

This correspondence is now submitted to the two Houses of Congress in compliance with the wish and request of General Von Scholten himself, and under the full persuasion, upon my part, that it will receive all the attention and consideration to which the very friendly relations that have so long subsisted between the United States and the King of Denmark especially entitle it in the councils of this Union.

General Von Scholten, Special Minister from Denmark, to Mr. Van Buren, Secretary of State of the United States.

CITY OF WASHINGTON, October 27, 1830.

The undersigned, Major General Von Scholten, Governor General of his Danish Majesty's West India possessions, and charged with a special mission near the United States' Government, has had the honor of representing verbally to his Excellency Martin Van Buren, Secretary of State of the United States, how deeply the interest of his Danish Majesty's West India possessions has been affected by the high duties imposed upon their staples in the United States, and the consequent necessity to his Majesty's Government of taking such measures as shall secure to the colonies a market for their products, in return for the supplies they shall want, and which they have been in the constant habit of taking from the United States.

Ever anxious to promote the welfare of his subjects, his Majesty has invariably encouraged and protected a commercial intercourse of this description between the United States and his Majesty's West India possessions, as an intercourse founded in nature by the proximity of the geographical position of both territories, and the fitness of their products for a mutual exchange. Acting upon this principle, his Majesty never went to the full extent of the colonial system in reserving to the mother country an exclusive privilege of trading with the colonies, but admitted, at all times, American ships and their cargoes, while the ships of all other nations were excluded. The undersigned is frank to allow that this was not considered a favor bestowed upon America, but the consequence only of a system which the interest and welfare of the colonies recommended; yet it bears an unequivocal stamp of a friendly disposition towards the United States, inasmuch as his Majesty did not suffer any jealousy with regard to the shipping interest of Denmark, or any deficiency in a fair reciprocity on the part of the United States, to divert him, in his colonial system, from that policy which nature, in his judgment, pointed out and recommended, of allowing the colonies to take their supplies from the United States, while the United States were willing to take their sugar and rum in return.

His Majesty saw, no doubt with regret, the perseverance with which the United States' Government formerly adhered to a system of discriminating duties of tonnage and impost, which excluded altogether Danish ships from any participation whatever in the intercourse between the United States and his Majesty's West India possessions, and more particularly the strong character which this disposition assumed in the year 1803, when the question of abolishing discriminating duties, upon the principle of reciprocity, was agitated and lost in Congress; yet no countervailing measures were ever adopted in his Majesty's colonies, from a due regard to the interest of these colonies, and the ships of the United States were consequently left, for more than forty years, in full and exclusive possession of the whole carrying trade between said colonies and the United States. The American ships have, however, of late maintained the same ground, notwithstanding the convention of the 26th of April, 1826, by which Danish ships were admitted to a fair competition with them; and it has, therefore, been fully established by actual experiment, that all the benefit to be derived by the shipping interest from any commercial intercourse between the United States and his Majesty's West India possessions, is entirely and exclusively in favor of the United States, as an advantage naturally belonging to them from the proximity of their position, and the character of the trade; and it is, therefore, now neither disputed nor complained of.

But when the shipping interest of the United States is so essentially benefited by a commercial intercourse with his Majesty's West India possessions, it is a subject of regret that the United States should not have been content with this advantage, but should have proceeded upon a system indicating a persuasion that the colonies would be under the necessity of taking their supplies from the United States, whether the United States would take their products in return or not. This is justly to be regretted, because those pretensions are entirely at variance with the first principle of all commercial intercourse, that of being based upon a mutual exchange of commodities; and which, moreover, is so apparent and direct in its application, with regard to the relation in which his Majesty's West India possessions stand to the United States.

The climate and soil in the island of St. Croix being peculiarly favorable to the cultivation and manufacture of sugar and rum, those articles have been cultivated and manufactured in preference to provisions; and the United States being placed by nature in a reverse position, the exchange of their respective products was a natural consequence, and, as such, favored and encouraged by his Majesty's Government. The planters of the island of St. Croix have thus been in the constant habit, from the very time the island came into his Majesty's possession, of taking their supplies from the United States, and of looking to the United States for a market for their sugar and rum in return. Nay, so decidedly has this been the case, that the prevailing usage of the island has been, and still is, to effect this exchange of sugar and rum against supplies in a direct manner, without the intervention of money. In this way, almost the whole of the rum manufactured in the island has, for years, been disposed of to American merchants, supplying the estates with Indian meal, flour, salted provisions, hoops, staves, in short, every thing coming under the denomination of supplies, on the express condition of taking rum in payment at a certain price. The rum, however, not being sufficient by itself to cover the expenses for supplies, a great portion of the sugar crop has annually been employed and disposed of in the same manner. From this character of the trade, and which exhibits its real nature, it is evident that a refusal on the part of the United States of admitting sugar and rum from the island of St. Croix, on fair terms, into the market of the United States, in exchange of supplies thence to be received, must inevitably destroy the trade, and put an end to the intercourse altogether.

The United States possess, unquestionably, great natural advantages over Europe in general in the supplying of the West Indies; but those advantages are certainly overrated when the colonies are considered as depending upon them exclusively, or without any regard to terms. It is a well known fact, that the cultivation of provisions has been carried to a great extent in the British islands, as connected with their agricultural and commercial system; and the experiment was likewise successfully made in the island of St. Croix during the British occupation, but afterwards abandoned upon the restoration of the island, on account of the facility afforded by the Danish Government to the commercial intercourse and exchange of commodities with the United States. Nor is the expense, difficulty, and inconvenience in getting supplies from Europe so great as generally represented. The bulk of exports from the colonies surpasses that of imports to such a degree that the outward bound freight forms but a very small item in the expense, and brings, therefore, Europe, as it were, so much nearer to the West Indies. The British colonies, in particular, were never supplied with salted provisions from the United States; and, by a reference to the statistical account of the island of Cuba, by Governor Velez, and inserted in abstract in the American Quarterly Review for June, this year, an evidence will be had of what may be effected by legislative measures, when circumstances make it desirable to encourage the supplying of the colonies from Europe. It will be seen with astonishment how the importation of flour from the United States into the Havana has decreased of late years, the same having been 68,395 barrels in the year 1827, and only 30,830 in the year 1828; while that from Spain was but 37,662 barrels in the former year, and rose to 86,642 in the latter. It is, therefore, neither visionary nor of difficult execution to give such a direction to the trade of the West Indies, and the less so when it is the natural course which the trade ultimately must take under a prohibitory system in the United States against the staples of the West Indies.

The undersigned has laid particular stress upon the mutual exchange of products, as the first principle of all commercial intercourse, and as being of more direct application to the intercourse between the United States and his Majesty's West India possessions. Supposing, upon this principle, an exchange of rum against Indian meal to be allowed in the United States, without any duty whatever, this commercial convertibility of Indian meal into rum may fairly be stated as a simile to the operation of distilling—with that difference only, that the building employed is a ship instead of a distillery, and the hands American seamen instead of common laborers. Such an exchange of products, however, which, in the opinion of the undersigned, would have been fair and profitable to both parties, giving a result according to the option of those concerned, has been interdicted by the tariff of the United States, not with a view to the prevention of intemperance, as no tax or restraint whatever has been imposed upon the distilling of spirits from grain or molasses, nor to protect New Orleans rum, which, from peculiar circumstances unfavorable to its manufacture, does not constitute a staple in the market, but solely for the purpose of precluding a foreign article from the American market, and superseding it by an exclusive privilege given to a domestic manufacture known by the name of New England rum. This rum is manufactured from foreign molasses, allowed to be imported for that purpose chiefly, and not from New Orleans molasses, which bears a higher price in the market as a substitute for sugar. New England rum is, therefore, not a domestic article in its raw materials; but as molasses does not make a good quality of rum without a due proportion of skimmings, which are not to be had in the New England States, the New England rum is besides of a very inferior quality to that manufactured in the West Indies, and becomes only marketable for home consumption by an admixture of a certain proportion of St. Croix rum; after which, this spurious article is thrown into the market, and passed off under the name of St. Croix rum: nay, so great is the difference between St. Croix rum and New England rum, that, notwithstanding the prohibitory duty imposed upon foreign spirits in the United States, a small quantity of St. Croix rum continues to be imported for the above purpose, and is actually paid for, on account of the high duty, at the rate of eighty-five cents per gallon, while the price of New England rum is only twenty-six. Exclusive protection has thus been given to a most inferior article, which has been forced upon the consumers without any other benefit to the country than what may result from the employment given to a very limited number of hands in the operation of distilling the molasses, while the vital interest of a neighboring colony has been disregarded, possessing in its climate and soil a natural advantage in producing a superior article, constituting, by nature, a staple commodity of its production, and receiving almost without restriction the produce of the United States, to a very large amount; by which means, the industry of this country, in its various branches, has been encouraged and maintained in the same proportion; even the stills, worms, vats, and butts, used in the manufacture of rum in the island of St. Croix, are taken from the United States.

In all the bar-rooms throughout the Union, the name of St. Croix rum is still conspicuous as a sign of the extensive intercourse which formerly existed between the United States and the island of St. Croix, and of the great demand its produce met with in the American market. At that time it was the real and genuine article, which was sold every where without adulteration; while at present only the name is borrowed, to cover an imitation spirit of a most inferior quality.

It has been shown above how this great change has been brought about, to the great injury of the island of St. Croix, without any adequate profit to the United States; and, by further pursuing its consequences, a total change in the trade of the colony will be found to be the inevitable result. The island of St. Croix cannot give up the natural advantages possessed by her in making rum of a superior quality from her molasses and skimmings on the spot. If, therefore, the prohibitory system be persisted in on the part of the United States, all the rum manufactured in the island of St. Croix, being, as the supposition is, excluded from the American market, which formerly even constituted its only market, must of course be shipped to Europe; and, when so shipped, all the supplies required, to that extent in value, must be taken from the same quarter.

The undersigned knows from actual experience, as Governor General of his Majesty's West India possessions, that it is not, and cannot be, in the power of the planters of the island of St. Croix to contract for their supplies in any other way than by barter, or a direct exchange of commodities. The supplies must be contracted for, payable in rum and sugar; and rum and sugar must be given in payment for supplies. To buy supplies in money, to raise that money by bills of exchange, and to rely upon the payment of such bills from the proceeds of produce shipped to a third place, distant from the colony as Denmark is, is altogether impracticable. The planters have not the credit to do it, nor is it their interest so to act. It is the merchant's business to take the chances of the markets upon himself, to furnish the supplies, and to take rum and sugar in return, and thus to close the transaction with the planter at once. From this character of the trade, the course it will and necessarily must take, under the circumstances above stated, is evident; and hence it becomes incumbent upon his Majesty's Government to anticipate the result by legislative measures calculated to facilitate the transition from the present system, which is altogether in favor of a commercial intercourse with the United States, to the full extent of the supplies required, to a new system, limited in its principles by the encouragement and protection which the colonial trade of the mother country shall require, and upon which the colony, under such circumstances, must be thrown for its supplies.

With regard to the importation of sugar into the United States from the island of St. Croix, the duty of three cents per pound cannot be said to be an absolute prohibitory duty; but it falls, nevertheless, very heavy upon the West India planter; and is the more felt, as the price of that commodity has generally declined all over the world, which increases the relative proportion said duty bears to the actual price. If that price be four dollars in the West Indies, which has been its low ebb this present year, the duty of three cents per pound amounts to seventy-five per cent. of the original cost; while, assuming the price to be seven dollars, which was readily paid some years ago, it gives a proportion of about forty-three per cent. only. Commissions, interest, and insurance, ashore, are affected in the same manner, and become heavier on the article in proportion to its decline in price. A still greater drawback, however, results from the manner in which consumption is affected by the price at which an article is sold in the market. It is in the power of the United States' Government and Legislature, by reducing the high duty now existing upon sugar, to create an increased demand for that article, proportioned to the increased culture which of late years has taken place; and thus promote the comforts of the people, and the interest of commerce generally, depending upon production and consumption, domestic and foreign. Without such an aid, the market of the United States will possess no allurements; the difference between the prices in Europe and America will be too trifling to encourage the trade with the United States; and the colonial system adopted by other nations, and in a manner forced upon his Majesty's Government by the prohibitory system of the United States, will, by its direct influence over a great portion of the trade, naturally give a similar tendency to the whole.

His Majesty is, however, far from desiring such a state of things. With him, the proximity of the United States to the West Indies was always a primary consideration; and, duly appreciating all the advantages resulting from that position, his Majesty conceives it to be the interest of both countries to cultivate and protect a commercial intercourse in this hemisphere, and not to suffer it to be sacrificed in consequence of a jealousy with regard to the benefits to be derived from it. Impressed with this conviction, and relying with full confidence on the liberal views of the United States' Government, his Majesty has deemed it expedient that an extension of the sixth article of the treaty of 1826 should be proposed to the President of the United States, having for its object to secure and confirm the intercourse therein provided for by the means of mutual concessions, upon the principle of a fair reciprocity, the outlines of which may be given in the simple proposition that the island of St. Croix being the natural customer of the United States, the United States will be her customer to the same extent; the interchange of commodities to be favored on both sides by a tariff accommodated to the circumstances of the case.

The undersigned having been honored with his Majesty's confidence upon this occasion, has addressed himself to his Excellency the Secretary of State with all the frankness which his Excellency's character so justly inspires; and after the various conversations he has had with his Excellency upon this subject, he feels no hesitation in declaring, at once, the full extent of concessions which he has been authorized to make as the basis of such an arrangement on the one side, trusting that they will be taken into due consideration by the United States' Government, and elicit concessions in return of a character to accomplish the object in view. His Majesty is thus disposed to engage, for a term to be fixed hereafter—

1st. That, in the intercourse of the island of St. Croix with foreign countries beyond the West Indian seas, no foreign ships but those of the United States shall be admitted to an entry at the custom-houses of the island, nor suffered to export produce thence; (the whole trade of the island will thus be reserved to the Danish and American flag;)

2d. That Indian corn and Indian corn meal, imported into the island of St. Croix from the United States, shall be subject to no duty whatever; (this article amounts to nearly 20,000 puncheons annually;)

3d. That all other articles, without any limitation whatever, shall be allowed to be imported into the island of St. Croix from the United States, subject to such duties only as by this arrangement shall be agreed upon, and which shall not exceed five per cent. ad valorem on certain articles considered necessities, or of general use and consumption, as flour, salted provisions of any kind, butter, cheese, tallow, candles, fish oil, oil of turpentine, live stock and horses, staves, hoops, headings, shingles, boards and deals of all descriptions, and all sorts of manufactured goods of the coarser kind, whether made from wood, metals, wool, or cotton, and not exceeding ten per cent. ad valorem on all other articles coming more properly under the denomination of luxuries, as furnitures, carriages, gigs, &c.

By these concessions, if not repelled, the island of St. Croix will be linked to the United States by ties but very little inferior to those existing between the colony and the mother country. The island of St. Croix stands already in quite another relation to the United States than any other colony in the West Indies. From the protection hitherto given by the Danish Government to the American trade, American merchants have settled in the island, fortunes have been made, money lent out, and landed properties acquired by them to such an extent that the interest of the United States has become most essentially concerned in the welfare and prosperity of the island, and more particularly in the removal of all shackles upon the commercial intercourse between the two countries. This feeling has manifested itself in the United States in a manner not to be misconceived by Government. It is fairly an American interest of no small amount, which his Majesty is anxious to protect jointly with that of his own subjects.

From the report of the Committee on Commerce in the House of Representatives last year, and from what appears to be the public opinion generally, the undersigned takes it for granted, that, whenever the subject shall have been more fully discussed in the ensuing session of Congress, the prohibitory duty upon rum, and the very heavy duty upon sugar, will be considerably reduced. To this reduction, however, in its general character, the concessions above offered can have no reference. The concessions offered, if accepted, will place the island of St. Croix in a particular relation to the United States, different from that in which all other foreign colonies stand to this country. If they shall make the same concessions, they will of course be placed upon the same footing, but not until then.

This consideration leads naturally to a discrimination in the duties. A foreign market, secured to the general industry of the United States in the way proposed, without any restriction whatever, will, in a great measure, participate in the character of a home market, and from that circumstance assume an intermediate station between that and foreign markets in general. It is conceived to be the interest of the United States to maintain this distinction, and to graduate the duties accordingly. With regard to the island of St. Croix, an additional argument may be adduced in its favor, taken from its proximity to the island of St. Thomas, where the American trade has already developed itself under the protection of the Danish Government.

The duty upon sugar may thus be divided in a certain proportion, considering one part of it as a protecting duty in favor of sugar cultivation within the territory of the United States, and another part as a discriminating duty in favor of foreign markets fairly thrown open to the whole industry of the United States; and therefore making said discrimination recoil upon that industry as a benefit.

With regard to the importation of rum from the island of St. Croix, the undersigned is perfectly at a loss to account not only for the prohibitory duty imposed upon that article, but also for any duty whatever in the character of protection. He has stated his reasons; and, if there be any arguments left against them, he relies with confidence on their removal by a due consideration of the terms upon which his Government is ready to meet the United States' Government in giving extension, stability, and protection to the commercial intercourse in question. As far as a duty upon rum, nevertheless, may be deemed expedient in the United States for the sake of revenue, a discrimination in the duty, as above stated, is suggested to his Excellency as an essential item in the proposed arrangement.

By the colonial system adopted and acted upon in the island of St. Croix, provision has been made to exempt from restriction such portions of the produce of the island as shall be deemed necessary to cover the supplies annually received from the United States. A general permit has thus been granted for the exportation of rum to the United States without any restriction whatever; but, with regard to sugar, only such a quantity has been allowed to be shipped to the United States as shall appear indispensable in making up for the deficiency in the rum for the above purpose; and, as a standard to go by in ascertaining this quantity, the right of exporting sugars to the United States has been connected with the importation of certain articles of prime necessity. From this statement, it will appear that particular pains have been taken by the Danish Government to regulate the exports by the imports, as nearly as may be, which secures a reciprocity in the commercial intercourse with regard to the amount, if so required, with a view to any discrimination of duty in the United States that may be agreed upon. For this very reason, it is not proposed to include the islands of St. Thomas and St. John's in the arrangement, both being exempted from the colonial restrictions to which St. Croix is subject, and which afford the guaranty above stated.

The undersigned flatters himself with the hope of having satisfied his Excellency the Secretary of State of the extent of the interest involved in the question. He feels confident that the intercourse at stake cannot be considered of less importance to the United States than it is to the island of St. Croix. Both parties are equally interested in coming to an understanding upon the subject: the necessity, however, is more pressing on the part of the island of St. Croix; in consequence of the pernicious effects already produced in that island by the tariff of the United States. The inhabitants have, therefore, earnestly implored his Majesty to remove the evil, or to apply a remedy; and, from the extent of their grievances, his Majesty would have lost no time in urging this subject upon the attention of the United States' Government at an earlier period, if he had not been refrained for a while from so doing by the consideration of another question of great importance and delicacy, at the time still pending between the two countries. The interest of the colony was, however, attended to immediately upon the settlement of this question; and, from the intimate knowledge possessed by the undersigned of the true interest of his Majesty's West India possessions, over which he has the honor of presiding in the capacity of Governor General, and the warm support he deemed it his duty to give to the complaint of the planters, he was selected by his Majesty for this mission to the United States' Government. He professes himself to be a zealous advocate of a commercial intercourse between the United States and the island of St. Croix, to the full extent of the supplies required; and would, therefore, exceedingly regret if he should fail in his attempt to save it, and be compelled, by an artificial state of things, to advocate another system. He feels, however, happy in having no apprehension of such a result in leaving the matter to the decision of the United States' Government.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to his Excellency the Secretary of State the assurance of his high and distinguished consideration.

P. V. SCHOLTEN.

To his Excellency M. VAN BUREN,
Secretary of State U. S.

Mr. Van Buren to General Von Scholten.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 29, 1830.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which was addressed to him on the 27th ultimo by Major General P. Von Scholten, Governor General of his Danish Majesty's West India possessions, and charged with a special mission near this Government, remonstrating against the injurious effects produced upon the commerce between those possessions and the United States, in consequence of the high duties imposed upon the importation of their staple productions into the ports of this Union; and apprising this Government that his Danish Majesty, anxious to promote, at once, the prosperity of his colonies, and the mutual and important interests involved in their trade with the United States, had authorized General Von Scholten to submit, through the undersigned, for the consideration of the President, the basis of a commercial arrangement founded on reciprocal concessions of exclusive privileges, on either side, calculated, as Gen. Von Scholten alleges, to facilitate an exchange, upon equal and advantageous terms, of the productions of the Danish West Indies for those of the United States; and to extend the benefit of the liberal provisions contained in the existing treaty between the two countries.

The undersigned having laid General Von Scholten's note before the President, has been directed to state to him, which he has now the honor to do, that its contents have received that earnest and deliberate consideration to which they were entitled, as well from their importance as from the high source and friendly motives from which they have emanated. The very friendly relations which have subsisted between the United States and Denmark; the perfect accord of liberal views, which has led the two Governments to establish their commercial intercourse upon the most enlarged principles of equality and reciprocity; the recent evidence given by his Danish Majesty of his desire to adjust amicably the only subject of difference existing between the two Governments; and the very flattering mode selected by him of communicating his views and propositions to the Executive of the United States, are considerations too strongly indicative of the King's frank and friendly dispositions towards this country, to have been overlooked by the President, and have added new incentives to his desire to reciprocate those friendly sentiments, and to go as far as his own sense of executive authority could permit in endeavoring to reconcile an acceptance, by him, of the propositions submitted by General Von Scholten, with his view of the obligations imposed upon the United States by existing laws, and by their solemn engagements with other nations.

Actuated by these views, it has, therefore, been with real and sincere regret that the President has been unable, after the most deliberate consideration and reflection, to overrule his own conviction that, under existing circumstances, he could not, consistently with the obligations just referred to, accede to the terms proposed by General Von Scholten as the basis of a commercial arrangement between the United States and Denmark, founded upon reciprocal concessions of exclusive privileges. This conviction, and the regret it draws after it, the undersigned has been directed to express to General Von Scholten.

The course of policy which has invariably been pursued by the United States in their commercial intercourse with foreign nations, and for a departure from which their Government can, at this time, discover no adequate cause, even if existing and imperative obligations did not put it out of their power to do so, has been to extend equal privileges to all nations who consent to reciprocate them with the United States; and their legislation has been uniformly predicated upon that principle. The President would have found in this consideration alone, apart from all others, a powerful motive for the utmost caution in considering a proposition, which, like that contained in Gen. Von Scholten's note, involved a departure from general principles and uniform practice. But, in coming to a determination as to the course proper for him to pursue, he has been governed by motives which left him still less free to act upon the subject in a manner more consonant with the desire entertained by his Danish Majesty. These motives have their source in the treaties now in force between the United States and other nations, by virtue of which the productions of all of them, without distinction, are admitted into our ports upon payment of equal duties, and, in all other respects, upon equal conditions. These stipulations put it out of the power of this Government to make any exception, in that regard, in favor of the possessions of his Danish Majesty.

In reply to so much of General Von Scholten's note as remonstrates against the injurious effects produced by the heavy duties imposed upon the productions of his Danish Majesty's colonial possessions in the ports of the United States, and alludes to measures of redress and indemnity which his Majesty may feel himself constrained to resort to, in case of rejection by the United States of the propositions offered for their acceptance by General Von Scholten, the undersigned is instructed to say that the duties complained of form a part of the general legislative policy of the United States, adopted with a view to the protection of their own productions, which the President considers as being under the peculiar and appropriate direction of Congress—a direction which he does not wish to embarrass or abridge by any conventional compacts entered into by the Executive authority with foreign States. He can, however, with confidence, assure General Von Scholten, as well from his knowledge of the prevailing sentiment in that body, as from the known good will universally existing towards Denmark in the United States, and which has extended itself to every branch of this Government, that a failure on its part to modify its laws with a reference to the particular interests of his Danish Majesty's possessions can never be justly attributable to a want of disposition to improve and cherish the most liberal and friendly relations between the United States and Denmark, and to extend their commercial intercourse, as far as that can be done consistently with the respective interests of the two countries.

General Von Scholten has, in the note to which this is an answer, alluded to the measures which, in the event of the United States declining to accept his propositions, his Danish Majesty would feel himself compelled to adopt, in order to divert the trade of his West India possessions from its present channel, and to secure to the produce of those colonies, in some country other than the United States, an exchange upon advantageous terms. Upon this branch of the subject, the undersigned is directed to state to General Von Scholten, that, after the many proofs which the United States have received of his Danish Majesty's friendly dispositions towards them, and the full and frank explanation now given of the motives which govern the decision of their Executive on this occasion, the President feels confident, that, whatever may be the character of those measures, they will be dictated by no considerations inconsistent with existing treaties, or that may at all impair the good understanding which has characterized the relations between the two countries. Any measure adopted in that spirit, whose sole object will be to promote the interests of his Majesty's colonial subjects, whatever may be its effects upon the commerce of the United States, cannot but be looked upon by the President with the same liberal and friendly feelings with which, it is hoped, his Majesty will consider the conduct of the Federal Government in this negotiation. To this sentiment the undersigned begs leave to add his own conviction that, in the arrangements which the Danish Government may find it expedient to adopt in relation to its West India trade, it will not lose sight of the natural and undoubted advantages which it derives from the relative geographical situation, and the respective productions, of the Danish islands and the United States.

In concluding this note, the undersigned cannot, in justice to his own feelings, refrain from expressing to General Von Scholten his deep sense of the satisfaction which he has derived from the frank and friendly manner in which this negotiation has been opened and conducted by General Von Scholten. Such dispositions could not but meet with a full reciprocation on the part of this Government; and the undersigned finds in these mutual good feelings an additional cause to regret that it could not reconcile with its own sense of duty and expediency a ready acceptance of the friendly overtures made by the Government of his Danish Majesty.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to General Von Scholten the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

M. VAN BUREN.

General Von Scholten to Mr. Van Buren.

WASHINGTON, December 4, 1830.

The undersigned, Major Gen. Von Scholten, Governor General of his Danish Majesty's West India possessions, and charged with a special mission near the United States' Government, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note which was addressed to him on the 29th ultimo by Mr. Martin Van Buren, Secretary of State of the United States; and, while he laments the failure of his mission, therein communicated, he cannot but highly appreciate the frankness and candor with which the Secretary of State, by the President's order, has entered upon the whole question.

It is not for the undersigned to put any construction upon the engagements into which the United States' Government may have entered. Suffice it to say, that the United States' Government has expressed itself bound by solemn treaties not to make specific duties the subject of reciprocity in a commercial intercourse with other nations; and the undersigned must, of course, abide by that decision. It not only removes every question of any particular convention being concluded between Denmark and the United States on the subject of the colonial trade, but precludes even the possibility of any act of Congress authorizing the President of the United States to reduce the duties within certain limits in favor of any particular colony or nation that might adopt a similar or specific reduction of duties in return.

But although specific duties may not enter into the commercial arrangements between two nations, it cannot be maintained that no reference whatever is had to the duties imposed upon commerce by spontaneous legislation of either party. If the bounties of nature were equally distributed throughout the world, and every country adapted to every kind of production, there might be some chance of accommodating industry to any particular legislation; but when the production of a country is marked out by nature, and its staples naturally confined to one or two articles, which is the case with the island of St. Croix, the produce of which consists exclusively of sugar and rum, it is evident that any prohibitory duty upon the importation of those articles into the United States will as effectually close the ports of the United States against the whole industry of that country as if the law were so expressed in direct terms. The possibility of a circuitous intercourse by the means of the industry of a third or fourth nation, cannot be assigned as an adequate compensation for the loss of a direct one, which must be allowed to be the only consideration, in a commercial point of view, between two countries, relative to the industry of their people. A fair system of duties and imposts, which shall admit the possibility of an exchange of commodities, appears, therefore, to be the indispensable condition contemplated by the commercial interest throughout the world; and a departure from it, by exorbitant and prohibitory duties, never failed to draw forth complaints from the parties aggrieved, though the present state of commerce does not admit of a more specific expression. From this view of the subject, the undersigned cannot relinquish the hope that it may be deemed fair by the United States' Government, and at the same time suit its own interest, to modify and reduce the present duties, which weigh so heavily upon the staples of the West Indies, not as a favor to any colony in particular, but as a general measure only, for the purpose of preserving a beneficial intercourse with the West Indies. Whereas, however, the Secretary of State has stated it to be a subject which the President considers as being under the peculiar and appropriate direction of Congress, the undersigned is apprehensive lest he should be wanting in his duty with regard to the interest confided to his care, if he did not most respectfully request from the President that the various observations made by the undersigned, relative to the West India trade, might be laid before the Legislature of the United States, which shall have to decide upon a rule of policy, in which the interest of a most important part of his Majesty's possessions is so deeply concerned. The undersigned takes, therefore, the liberty to request the favor of the Secretary of State to submit to the President of the United States his present note.

In discussing the subject of a commercial intercourse between the United States and his Danish Majesty's West India possessions, the undersigned has proceeded with frankness and candor, and is happy to find that the Secretary of State has done him the justice to acknowledge that no unfriendly feelings have been involved in the question. From an impression that a concentrated trade with the United States would be more beneficial to the island of St. Croix, as susceptible of more certainty and regularity in its operation than a scattered intercourse with Europe in general, the trade of the colony was actually so confined by law. American vessels were the only foreign vessels admitted into the colony, and the intercourse with the United States the only foreign intercourse, beyond the West India seas, allowed. No wonder, then, that this intercourse should have increased to the extent it at one time did, nor that an embarrassment should have been felt in the same ratio, when the resources of the colony actually were rendered unavailable in the American market. This having been the case, the system became no longer tenable; and, in explaining that circumstance to the United States' Government, the undersigned flatters himself to have removed every unfavorable impression which otherwise might result from the adoption of a new system for the colonial trade of the island of St. Croix, should a continuation of the present duties in the United States upon the staples of the West Indies render the same indispensably necessary: he feels, however, perfectly satisfied that no departure from the present system will be made without the greatest reluctance, and that, therefore, it will be limited to such measures only as the interest of the colony may be deemed imperiously to require.

Although the negotiations opened by the undersigned with the Secretary of State have not led to a result favorable to the views of his Majesty's Government, yet the undersigned has derived great satisfaction from the good feeling and friendly disposition evinced by the United States' Government upon this occasion, and which presents an additional pledge of that good understanding between the two countries which it will no less be his Majesty's desire to cultivate and improve.

In concluding this note, the undersigned begs leave to express to the Secretary of State the fullest acknowledgment of the courtesy which has been extended to him, and avails himself of this opportunity to tender to the Secretary of State the assurance of his most distinguished consideration.

P. VON SCHOLTEN.

Mr. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
Secretary of State of the United States.

Mr. Van Buren to General Von Scholten.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, Dec. 10, 1830.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has submitted to the President the note which Major General Von Scholten, Governor General of his Danish Majesty's West India possessions, and his special minister to the United States, was pleased to address to him on the 4th instant, in reply to the one which the undersigned, by direction of the President, wrote to him on the 29th ultimo, upon the subject of certain propositions which he had made to this Government, for the regulation of the commercial intercourse between the United States and his Danish Majesty's said possessions.

The undersigned is expressly directed by the President to observe to General Von Scholten, as he has the honor of doing, in reply to this last communication from him, that, in the exercise of the high and responsible duty with which he is charged by the constitution and laws of this Union, in regard to its foreign relations, he could derive no greater satisfaction than from a cordial and zealous co-operation with his Danish Majesty in accommodating the commercial intercourse between the United States and the Danish West India possessions to the views and wishes of his Danish Majesty upon the subject, as far as this might be found competent to him, and not incompatible with his sense of the paramount interests of his constituents, or of their engagements to other States. Under these circumstances, the undersigned is likewise especially instructed by the President to repeat to General Von Scholten, upon the present occasion, the deep regret which was experienced at having been obliged, by the considerations which are already made known to him, to decline acceding to the overtures of General Von Scholten, in behalf of his sovereign, upon that important concern. The undersigned has great pleasure, however, in stating, by direction also of the President, that he will take an early opportunity, in conformity with the wish expressed by General Von Scholten, to submit to Congress, during its present session, a copy of the entire correspondence which has passed between General Von Scholten and this department, in relation to the proposed modification of the commercial intercourse referred to.

The undersigned renews to General Von Scholten the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

M. VAN BUREN.

General Von Scholten to Mr. Van Buren.

WASHINGTON, December 11, 1830.

The undersigned, Major General Von Scholten, Governor General of His Danish Majesty's West India possessions, and charged with a special mission to the United States' Government, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note addressed to him on the 10th of this month by Mr. Martin Van Buren, Secretary of State of the United States, communicating the final answer from the President of the United States respecting the propositions made by the undersigned for the regulation of the commerce of the United States with his Danish Majesty's possessions; which propositions are positively and finally declared unacceptable by the President, but in such terms and spirit of friendly disposition towards his Danish Majesty's Government, as cannot fail to prove gratifying.

With respect to the part of the above note communicating the President's consent to the respectful request of the undersigned, that his former statements respecting the United States' commerce with his Danish Majesty's West India possessions might be laid before Congress, the undersigned begs leave to express his full sense of the readiness and unreserve with which the above request, in behalf of his Government, has been acceded to, and his sincere hope that an early and favorable decision upon the desired modification in their commercial intercourse may still render a continuation of the same possible.

In this hope, and relying with all the confidence and security which the liberal and friendly proceedings of the Secretary of State, in the course of the late negotiations, so justly inspire, upon the frank concurrence of the United States' Government for the attainment of the object in view, the undersigned considers the interest of his Danish Majesty's West India possessions in the desired modification as thus more secure than his own continued presence could possibly render it; and begs leave, in case of any additional information or communication being required, to refer the Secretary of State to his Danish Majesty's chargé d'affaires, Chevalier Steen Bille, for such.

The undersigned has, therefore, in conclusion, only to add the renewed assurances of the high gratification and pleasure derived from the courtesy and frankness with which the late negotiations have invariably been marked on the part of the United States' Government, and to request the favor of the Secretary of State that he will receive the President's directions respecting the time when it may be his pleasure to allow the undersigned the honor of waiting on him, previous to his departure from the city. The undersigned avails himself of the present opportunity to tender to the Secretary of State the assurance of his high consideration.

P. V. SCHOLTEN.

TRADE WITH BRITISH COLONIES.

Message from the President of the United States, transmitting the papers relating to the recent arrangement in relation to the trade between the United States and the British colonies, &c.

To the Senate of the United States:

I communicate to Congress the papers relating to the recent arrangement with Great Britain, with respect to the trade between her colonial possessions and the United States, to which reference was made in my message at the opening of the present session.

It will appear from those documents, that, owing to the omission, in the act of the 29th May last, of a clause expressly restricting importations into the British colonies in American vessels to the productions of the United States; to the amendment engrafted upon that act in the House of Representatives, providing that, when the trade with the West India colonies should be opened, the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions or possessions should be left on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it now is; and to the act not specifying the terms upon which British vessels coming from the Northern colonies should be admitted to entry into the ports of the United States, an apprehension was entertained by the Government of Great Britain, that, under the contemplated arrangement, claims might be set up, on our part, inconsistent with the propositions submitted by our minister, and with the terms to which she was willing to agree; and that this circumstance led to explanations between Mr. McLane and the Earl of Aberdeen, respecting the intentions of Congress, and the true construction to be given to the act referred to.

To the interpretation given by them to that act, I did not hesitate to agree. It was quite clear that, in adopting the amendment referred to, Congress could not have intended to preclude future alterations in the existing intercourse between the United States and other parts of the British dominions; and the supposition that the omission to restrict, in terms, the importations to the productions of the country to which the vessels respectively belong, was intentional, was precluded by the propositions previously made by this Government to that of Great Britain, and which were before Congress at the time of the passage of the act, by the principles which govern the maritime legislation of the two countries, and by the provisions of the existing commercial treaty between them.

Actuated by this view of the subject, and convinced that it was in accordance with the real intentions of Congress, I felt it my duty to give effect to the arrangement, by issuing the required proclamation, of which a copy is likewise herewith communicated.

First. The trade between the United States and the British American colonies.—The policy of the United States in relation to their commercial intercourse with other nations, is founded on principles of perfect equality and reciprocity. By the adoption of these principles, they have endeavored to relieve themselves from the discussions, discontents, and embarrassments, inseparable from the imposition of burdensome discriminations. These principles were avowed whilst they were yet struggling for their independence, are recorded in their first treaty, and have since been adhered to with the most scrupulous fidelity. In the year 1815 they repealed all their acts imposing discriminating tonnage duties on foreign ships or vessels, and of impost, so far as respected the produce or manufacture of the nations to which such foreign ships or vessels might belong; such repeal to take effect in favor of any foreign nation which should abolish similar duties, so far as they operated to the disadvantage of the United States.

In the year 1817, they restricted the importation into the United States, in foreign vessels, to articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the country to which such vessels belonged, or as could only be, or were most usually, shipped in the first instance from such country; provided that such regulations should not extend to the vessels of any foreign nation which had not adopted, or should not adopt, a similar regulation with regard to them.

In the year 1824, they declared the suspension of all discriminating duties, in relation to the vessels and produce of several European nations, and of their territories in Europe, which had accepted of the terms proffered by the act of 1815, and conferred authority upon the President to extend the same exemption to all nations thereafter complying with its requirements; and in 1828 an act was passed, authorizing the President to extend the exemption in regard to alien duties, which, by the acts of 1815 and 1824, was restricted to the productions of the country to which the vessel belongs, to the productions of any foreign country imported into the United States in the vessels of any nation which would allow a similar exemption in favor of the United States.

The terms proposed by our act of 1815 were adopted in the commercial treaty between the United States and Great Britain in the same year, which has been twice extended, and is now in full force. By it, the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British possessions in Europe is established upon just and equal terms. The United States desired to place their trade with the British American colonies on the same footing. The Government of Great Britain would not then consent to that arrangement; and it was consequently stipulated in the treaty that the intercourse between the United States and his Britannic Majesty's possessions in the West Indies, and on the continent of North America, should not be affected by any of its provisions, and that each party should remain in complete possession of its respective rights with regard to such intercourse. The trade and intercourse between the United States and the British colonies previous to, and at that time, were such only as were permitted by British legislation, or regulation by orders in council. It had always been of a restricted and unequal character, and every previous attempt to place it upon just terms had wholly failed. Since 1815, both Governments have uniformly admitted it to be their belief that a commercial intercourse between the United States and the British colonial possessions referred to, upon terms of fair reciprocity, would promote their mutual interests.

To establish it upon such terms has always been the sincere object of this country, and, until a very late period, the avowed wish of Great Britain.

The twelve years which have elapsed, have, with occasional intermission, been employed in endeavors to arrange those terms by negotiation, or to secure them through the agency of separate legislative enactments; and, although the two Governments have more than once concurred in each other's views as to the conditions to which they would assent, their respective acts have resulted in the almost entire suppression of the trade. Since the 1st December, 1826, there has been a total non-intercourse between the United States and the British American colonies in British vessels, and the same in regard to American vessels, (with the exception of the permission allowed to the latter to carry on a direct trade with the British North American possessions, the Bahama islands, and the island of Anguilla, upon terms prescribed by Great Britain alone.) The acts of the two Governments which have led to this result, are so intimately connected with the positions which they respectively occupy, and of a nature calculated to have so much influence on the measures of conciliation and redress which may be adopted, as to render it important that they should be fully known and accurately understood. Your participation in the public councils has given you a general view of their principal outlines; but it is thought advisable to furnish you with a more particular exposition than the opportunities you have enjoyed would allow you to obtain. A very brief sketch of such as are most prominent, is, with this view, submitted to you.

The direct trade between the United States and Great Britain was found to be so interwoven with, and dependent upon, that between the United States and the colonies, as, in a great measure, to deprive the former of the advantages intended to be secured to them by the treaty of 1815, so long as the intercourse of the colonies was monopolized by British navigators. Several efforts were consequently made, between the years 1815 and 1818, to induce the British Government to adjust this collision of interests by amicable negotiation. They were unsuccessful. In 1817, a proposition was submitted to our minister at London, by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Lord Castlereagh, which was said to contain all that could then be assented to by Great Britain towards admitting the United States to a participation in the trade between them and the colonies. By this it was proposed to extend to the United States the provisions of their free port acts, which authorized a limited trade with portions of her colonies to the colonial inhabitants of foreign European possessions, in vessels of one deck, with some additional provisions in relation to the trade with Bermuda, Turk's Island, and the British territories in North America.

The terms contained in this proposition were decided by the Government of the United States to be inadmissible, and countervailing measures were resorted to.

The act of Congress of the 18th of April, 1818, concerning navigation, was passed. Its object was to counteract acts of a like character long before existing on the part of Great Britain, restrictive of the trade with her colonies in vessels of the United States. By that act the ports of the United States were closed against British vessels coming from any British colony which was, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels of the United States; and British vessels sailing with cargoes from ports of the United States were laid under bonds to land their cargoes in some port or place other than a colony closed against vessels of the United States.

The negotiation was in the same year renewed, and another attempt, equally unsuccessful, was made to open the trade, and establish it upon principles which were claimed by our Government to be those of fair reciprocity.

The act of Congress of the 15th of May, 1820, "supplementary to an act entitled 'An act concerning navigation,'" followed. By it, the ports of the United States were, after a certain day, closed against British vessels coming or arriving by sea from any British colonial port in the West Indies or America; and similar bonds were required from British vessels sailing from the ports of the United States, not to land their cargoes in any British American colony. Articles of British West Indian and North American produce were allowed by this act to be imported into the United States, only direct from the colony of which they were wholly the produce, growth, or manufacture. Thus establishing a non-intercourse in British vessels with all the British American colonies, and prohibiting the introduction into the United States of all articles the produce of those colonies, except that of each colony imported directly from itself.

Such was the relative state of the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, respectively, from September, 1820, till the passing of the act of Parliament of the 24th of June, 1822, and the consequent proclamation of the President.

By the act of the 6th of May, 1822, in anticipation of the passage of the British act last referred to, Congress authorized the President, upon his being satisfied that the British colonial ports were opened to the vessels of the United States, to open their ports to British vessels upon terms of reciprocal advantage. The act of Parliament of June, 1822, repealed several existing acts, and opened certain of the colonial ports to the admission of American vessels laden with certain articles of American produce, upon specified conditions, and restricting the intercourse to the direct trade between the United States and the colonies. The President, by his proclamation, issued immediately after the receipt of the British act, opened the ports of the United States to British vessels engaged in the colonial trade, subject to a like restriction, and upon terms which were deemed to be of reciprocal and equal advantage, but retaining our discriminating duties. The retention of the discriminating duties was made the subject of complaint and discussion on the part of the British Government. The measure was justified by ours, as being only a fair equivalent for the imposition of protecting duties on American produce in all, and export duties in some, of the colonies.

The King had authority, by act of Parliament, to interdict the trade to all nations which refused to allow privileges to British vessels engaged in the colonial trade, equal to those granted to foreign vessels by the act of the 24th of June, 1822, and, also, to impose countervailing duties, but neither power was then exercised.

The act of Congress of the 1st of March, 1823, was the next material step in the movements of the two Governments. At the period of its passage, the two countries were engaged in an extensive and valuable trade between the United States and the colonies, by virtue of the British act of Parliament and the President's proclamation, our discriminating duties remaining unrepealed, but continuing to be a cause of complaint on the part of Great Britain.

The influence which the passage of this act has obviously had upon the course of affairs in relation to the trade in question, together with the circumstance that the closing of our ports was the effect of its terms, renders it important that its provisions should be distinctly understood. They were, in substance, the following:

1st. It continued the suspension of the acts of 1818 and 1820, already effected by the President's proclamation, and opened our ports to a direct trade only with such of the British colonial ports as had been opened to us by the act of Parliament of June, 1822, subject, as things then stood, to the payment, by British vessels, of our alien or discriminating duties.

2dly. It put forth a claim, which had been previously advanced by us in our negotiations upon the subject, but always resisted by Great Britain, viz. that no higher duties should be imposed upon the productions of the United States in the British colonial ports, than upon those of Great Britain herself, or her other colonies, and which had been levied for the protection of their own produce. This was done by giving an authority to the President to suspend the payment of our discriminating duties by British vessels coming from the colonies, upon being satisfied that no such duties were levied in the colonies on our produce, and by declaring that, until such evidence was given, payment should continue to be exacted.

3dly. It restricted the trade to such British vessels as had come directly from the colonial ports, and had not touched at any other port after they left the colony.

4thly. It declared that its provisions should only be in force so long as the privileges granted by the act of Parliament of June, 1822, were allowed to our vessels, and that if, at any time thereafter, the trade, or any part of it, was prohibited to us by Great Britain, through an act of Parliament or order in council, and that fact proclaimed by the President, each and every of its provisions should cease, and the acts of 1818 and 1820 be revived and in full force.

The passage of this act was followed by the exercise of the authority given to the King to impose countervailing duties; and they were accordingly imposed to an amount equal to ours, by an order in council of the 21st July, 1823, upon all American vessels and their cargoes arriving in the colonial ports. Under these reciprocal impositions, the trade between the United States and the colonies was carried on from that time, until it was suppressed by both Governments, in the manner hereinafter stated.

The negotiation was resumed by Mr. Rush in January, 1824. In its course, propositions for regulating the trade were submitted by him, which received the assent of the British plenipotentiaries, with the exception of that prohibiting the imposition of protecting duties in the colonies, to which their dissent was expressed in the strongest terms.

Mr. Rush's instructions precluded him from settling the matter upon any other terms, and the negotiation was suspended in the month of June following.

On the 5th of July, 1825, an act of Parliament was passed, allowing the trade with the British colonies in North America, and the West Indies, to all foreign nations, upon conditions which will be hereafter referred to. It limited the privileges thus granted to foreign vessels, to the ships of those countries, not having colonies, which should place the commerce and navigation of Great Britain, and her possessions abroad, upon the footing of the most favored nation, unless the King, by order in council, should in any case deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the required condition was not, in all respects, complied with by such country.

Mr. King was sent to England in the summer of 1825, but without instructions upon this point. His continued indisposition induced him to return in the summer of 1826, and during that period no step was taken by either Government.

In the winter of 1825-'6, an attempt was made in Congress to meet the act of Parliament of July, 1825, by correspondent legislation, but it failed; and although the trade might, and most probably would, have been saved, if the act then introduced had become a law, it is nevertheless true, as has been stated, that it would not have been a strict compliance with the British act, if it had passed.

In the summer of 1826, Mr. Gallatin was sent to England with instructions, which authorized him to conclude an arrangement of the colonial question upon terms substantially the same with those which were offered by the British plenipotentiaries to Mr. Rush in 1824; but his authority was confined to an adjustment by treaty stipulation.

On the 27th of July, 1826, the King, by order in council, founded upon the act of Parliament of July, 1825, declared that the United States had not complied with the conditions of the act, and therefore directed that the trade and intercourse between the United States and the greater part of the British colonial ports should cease from and after the first day of December then following.

Mr. Gallatin arrived in England a few days after the publication of those orders in council. The determination of the British Government to decline all further negotiation upon the subject, was promptly and definitively announced to him. The foundation of this determination was avowed to consist principally in the reiterated refusals of this Government to accept of the only terms to which Great Britain would agree, and a subsequent change of the colonial policy of that Government, by opening her colonial ports to all foreign nations upon the conditions set forth in their acts of Parliament. The whole subject was laid before Congress by the President in the winter of 1827, and an unsuccessful attempt made to obtain the passage of a law requiring our ports to be closed also. Congress having adjourned without doing any thing in the matter, the President, by his proclamation dated the 17th day of March, 1827, declared the trade between the United States and all the British colonies, with which it had been allowed by the act of Parliament of 1822, to be prohibited, and the acts of Congress of 1818 and 1820 to be revived.

On the 16th of July, 1827, another British order in council was issued, embracing the regulation of the colonial trade with Great Britain with all nations; reciting the passage of an act of Parliament, by which it was declared that one year from the time of passing the act of July, 1825, should be the period in which an acceptance of its provisions by foreign nations should be valid; declaring what nations had so accepted the same, and closing their ports against all those that had not: among the latter, the United States were included.

The extent and operations of our acts of 1818 and 1820 have been before stated. The commercial relations between the United States and the British colonies have been regulated by their provisions, and the British order in council of July, 1827, from that period to the present day. By instructions from this department, of the 11th of April, 1827, Mr. Gallatin was authorized to announce to the Government of Great Britain the acquiescence of this in the proposition that the colonial trade should be regulated by law, and to ascertain the disposition of the British Government to open the trade by separate acts of legislation. This was distinctly done by Mr. Gallatin, in his note to Lord Dudley of the 4th of June, 1827. He was further informed that the President was willing to recommend to Congress, at its next session—

1st. To suspend the alien duties on British vessels and cargoes, and to allow their entry into our ports with the same kind of British colonial produce as may be imported in American vessels—the vessels of both countries paying equal charges.

2dly. To abolish the restrictions in the act of 1823 to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, thus leaving Great Britain in the exclusive possession of the circuitous trade between Great Britain proper through her colonies; and he was directed to inquire whether the passage of an act of Congress to that effect would lead to the revocation of the order in council of July, 1826, to the abolition of the discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonial ports, and to the enjoyment by our vessels of the advantages offered by the act of the 5th of July, 1825. The effect of these concessions, it was pointed out to him, would be a waiver of the claim of the United States, as made in the act of March, 1823, to the admission into the colonial ports of our produce upon the payment of the same duties as similar produce from other parts of the British possessions was required to pay.

No answer was made by the British Government to Mr. Gallatin's note of the 4th of June, 1827, announcing the willingness of this Government to arrange the trade by separate legislation; and Mr. Canning, on being applied to by Mr. Gallatin to know whether he might expect a reply, informed him that such was not the intention; that they considered that note as merely furnishing explanations; and he expressed his surprise that any doubt could exist as to the final disposition of the British Government upon that subject.

After Mr. Canning's death, the willingness of the United States to accept, through the medium of separate legislation, the terms of the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825, was again communicated by Mr. Gallatin to the British Government, by a note to Lord Dudley of the 17th August, 1827, in which he requested to be informed whether, if Congress complied with the recommendations which the President was willing to make, the United States would be admitted to the trade and intercourse allowed by the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825.

Mr. Huskisson, in a subsequent conference, informed Mr. Gallatin that Great Britain considered the colonial intercourse as exclusively under her control, and that whatever terms might be granted to foreigners, would be considered as an indulgence; that he was not prepared to say whether, in any way, or if at all, on what terms it would be opened to the United States, in case of their repealing their restrictive acts.

Lord Dudley, in reply to Mr. Gallatin's letters of the 4th June and 17th August, after reviewing the grounds urged by the United States to justify themselves in omitting to accept the terms of the act of Parliament of July, 1825, declined committing the British Government as to their course in the event of the United States adopting the measures proposed, on the following grounds, viz. 1st, That much must of necessity depend upon the details of the act which Congress might pass; 2dly, more on the condition of the country at the time of the passage, and the views which the British Government might then have of their interest in the matter; and, 3dly, that any stipulations on the subject would be a virtual departure from the ground taken by his Government to regulate the trade by law, and to decline all further negotiation concerning it.

The last information in the possession of this Government, in relation to the views of the present British ministry upon this subject, is derived from Mr. Barbour in January last. He states that, in a communication held with Lord Aberdeen, in the presence of the Duke of Wellington, the former expressed his desire of having the colonial trade question judiciously adjusted, and his conviction that the interdict was injurious to the colonies, without a proportionate benefit to any other section of the empire. But, from subsequent conversation with his lordship, and from information derived from other sources, Mr. Barbour was induced to believe that the British Government does not contemplate any relaxation of its colonial system in favor of this country; that our late tariff, together with a strong conviction of their incapacity to compete upon equal terms with our navigation, contributes to this disposition; and that that Government would willingly withdraw the privileges of trading with its colonies, which it has granted to other nations, if that could conveniently be done.

Such is the present state of our commercial relations with the British colonies; and such the steps by which we have arrived at it.

In reviewing the events which have preceded, and more or less contributed to, a result so much to be regretted, there will be found three grounds upon which we are most assailable: first, in our too long and too tenaciously resisting the right of Great Britain to impose protecting duties in her colonies; secondly, in not relieving her vessels from the restriction of returning direct from the United States to the colonies, after permission had been given by Great Britain to our vessels to clear out from the colonies to any other than a British port; and, thirdly, in omitting to accept the terms offered by the act of Parliament of July, 1825, after the subject had been brought before Congress, and deliberately acted upon by our Government. It is, without doubt, to the combined operation of these causes that we are to attribute the British interdict. You will, therefore, see the propriety of possessing yourself fully of all the explanatory and mitigating circumstances connected with them, that you may be enabled to obviate, as far as practicable, the unfavorable impression which they have produced.

The trade, although not wholly suppressed, is altogether changed in its character. Instead of being direct, active, and profitable as it once was, it is circuitous, burdensome, and comparatively profitless. The importation of the produce of the British West India colonies into the United States may be said to have substantially ceased. It is wholly prohibited in British vessels, and allowed only direct from the producing colony. By the orders in council, the admission of American vessels is prohibited. Consequently, whatever of British West India produce is brought into this country (with the exception of what has been recently allowed to be imported from the Bahama islands, and the island of Anguilla) must either be brought by the vessels of other nations, which are permitted, under the act of Parliament of July, 1825, to clear from the colonies for any other ports, except in Great Britain and her possessions, or it must be imported as the growth or produce of other colonies, to which the vessels of the United States are admitted, and thus introduced in evasion of our law.

The export trade has been more considerable, though greatly and injuriously reduced. The decrees of nature, by which the British West Indies are made dependent on the United States for a great portion of their necessary supplies, though erroneously resisted, have not been altogether frustrated by the retaliatory and improvident legislation of the two countries. Large quantities of American productions still find their way to the colonies. The uncertainty as to how much of our produce is used in the ports to which the exportations are nominally made, renders it impossible to speak with accuracy as to the amount actually consumed in the British West India colonies since the ports were closed. In the opinion of intelligent merchants, it is about half as much as immediately before the interdict. It is carried in American vessels to the islands of St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew on the one hand, and to the open ports in the British North American possessions on the other. From those ports, it finds its way to the British West India colonies, under different regulations, in British vessels. This trade is burdened with double freight and insurance, the charges of landing and reshipping, and also commissions and duties in the neutral ports, for that portion which goes by the way of St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew. The extra expenses thus produced have been estimated at fifty per centum on the first cost of lumber, and at from fifteen to twenty per centum on provisions. A great reduction of the quantity of our exports, and the entire exclusion from the trade of many articles of a perishable nature, which cannot now be sent in consequence of the increased length of the voyage, with its unfavorable effects upon our navigation, are the chief injuries which result to our citizens from this state of things. It oppresses the West India planter, by unavoidably increasing the prices of such articles of American produce as he still finds it his interest to purchase, notwithstanding the disadvantages imposed upon their introduction. It is, moreover, understood, that the indirect trade is carried on on British account, and that, therefore, the principal part of the extra expenses to which it is subjected comes ultimately out of their pockets.

It is the anxious wish of the President to put an end to a state of things so injurious to all parties. He is willing to regulate the trade in question upon terms of reciprocal advantage, and to adopt for that purpose those which Great Britain has herself elected, and which are prescribed by the act of Parliament of 5th July, 1825, as it is understood by us. You are directed to make a full and frank exposition of the views and wishes of the President in this respect, at as early a period, and in such manner, as you may judge best calculated to accomplish them, and to put it in his power to communicate the result of this overture to Congress at the opening of the next session. He is admonished by the past of the inutility of protracted discussions upon a subject which has been over and over again debated. He does not, therefore, wish to occupy you, or harass the British cabinet by their repetition. You are authorized to say to the British Government, on the part of the United States, that they will open their ports to British vessels coming from the British colonies, laden with such colonial productions as can be imported in American vessels, and upon terms in all respects equally favorable; and that they will also abolish the restriction contained in our act of 1823, confining the trade to a direct intercourse, upon condition that Great Britain will allow American vessels the privileges of trade and intercourse which were offered by the act of the 5th of July, 1825.

The President indulges a confident expectation that the British Government will assent to an adjustment upon these terms. He is compelled to think so, from a conviction that such an arrangement would promote the true interests of both parties—a result which he is confident is as much desired by Great Britain as it can be by himself, because she has heretofore given her deliberate assent to these terms; (and he finds nothing in the condition of the question which renders them less proper now than they were then;) and, finally, because he is unwilling to believe that Great Britain would make so invidious a distinction as to exclude us from a trade which she allows to the rest of the commercial world. The United States do not controvert her right to monopolize the trade with her colonies; and if the same interdict which excludes them from her colonial ports was extended to others, they would not complain. But the British Government cannot be insensible to the tendency which a discrimination of the character referred to must unavoidably have, to alienate those liberal and friendly feelings now entertained towards her by our people, and which it should be the pleasure, as it is the duty, of both Governments to cherish and perpetuate.

If the omission of this Government to accept of the terms proposed, when heretofore offered, be urged as an objection to their adoption now, it will be your duty to make the British Government sensible of the injustice and inexpediency of such a course.

The opportunities which you have derived from a participation in our public councils, as well as other sources of information, will enable you to speak with confidence (as far as you may deem it proper and useful so to do) of the respective parts taken by those to whom the administration of this Government is now committed, in relation to the course heretofore pursued upon the subject of the colonial trade. Their views upon that point have been submitted to the people of the United States; and the counsels by which your conduct is now directed are the result of the judgment expressed by the only earthly tribunal to which the late administration was amenable for its acts. It should be sufficient that the claims set up by them, and which caused the interruption of the trade in question, have been explicitly abandoned by those who first asserted them, and are not revived by their successors. If Great Britain deems it adverse to her interests to allow us to participate in the trade with her colonies, and finds nothing in the extension of it to others to induce her to apply the same rule to us, she will, we hope, be sensible of the propriety of placing her refusal on those grounds. To set up the acts of the late administration as the cause of forfeiture of privileges which would otherwise be extended to the people of the United States, would, under existing circumstances, be unjust in itself, and could not fail to excite their deepest sensibility. The tone of feeling which a course so unwise and untenable is calculated to produce, would doubtless be greatly aggravated by the consciousness that Great Britain has, by order in council, opened her colonial ports to Russia and France, notwithstanding a similar omission on their part to accept the terms offered by the act of July, 1825.

You cannot press this view of the subject too earnestly upon the consideration of the British ministry. It has bearings and relations that reach beyond the immediate question under discussion.

Should the amount of our protecting duties upon the productions of her colonies, or upon the manufactures of the mother country, be referred to, in connexion with this matter, you will be at no loss for the reply. The duties upon our agricultural productions, when imported into Great Britain, are, beyond comparison, greater than those imposed by the United States on the productions or manufactures of Great Britain or her colonies; and the denial of her right to impose duties on articles the production of the United States, when imported into the colonies, in order to protect those of the colonies themselves, or of the mother country, was a leading and avowed motive for the stand taken by Great Britain in relation to the colonial trade. This is a subject on which each nation must judge for itself. It is one upon which, it is well known, there exists great diversity of opinion among our own citizens, but in respect to which no stipulations can be made with a foreign Power, at least without reciprocal engagements on the part of such Power—engagements into which there is no reason to believe that the Government of Great Britain would at this time enter. If, by the imposition of those duties, the United States can secure the production of the same articles at home, it is their right and their duty to persevere. If not, the principal burden falls upon their own citizens, and consequently furnishes no cause of complaint on the part of others.

If the encouragement, by Great Britain, of her North American possessions in the growth and production of similar articles to those with which we supply her West India colonies, is the motive, the objection is no less obvious. To that end, the parent Government now exercises, without complaint or objection on our part, the common right of imposing higher duties on articles which are not, than on those which are, the growth or produce of their North American possessions; and, in doing so, she exercises to the full the right conceded to all nations, of encouraging home productions by the imposition of protecting duties. The exclusion of one nation from the privilege of bringing into the ports of another articles that come in competition with home productions, whilst their introduction is conceded to the rest of the world, is a measure which cannot find its justification in any principles applicable to the protective system. If, however, the President should be disappointed in his expectations, founded on these and other corresponding views of the subject, he wishes you to ask (a request which he is confident will be readily granted) that you may be favored with an early and definitive answer to the propositions you are authorized to submit. He makes this appeal to the candor of the British Government, that he may be enabled (in the event alluded to) to lay before Congress, at the commencement of the next session, the result of this overture, to the end that that portion of the capital and enterprise of our country, which is now waiting the decision of the question, may seek other channels of employment.

Should your advances be met in the spirit in which they are offered, it will become important to consider of the form in which the proposed adjustment ought to be made.

This Government has heretofore strenuously contended for an arrangement by treaty, and that of Great Britain has as strenuously opposed any other mode than that of separate legislation. The President is willing to adopt either mode. If the views of the British Government are now different in that respect, and an arrangement by treaty be acceptable, you are authorized to conclude it upon the principles of these instructions. In that event, the President relies upon your known discretion and intelligence, that the articles to which you agree shall be in such form as will carry into full and fair effect the views of this Government as now expressed.

If (which is most probable) a resort to mutual legislation is preferred, the consideration of the mode best calculated for the satisfaction of both parties will occupy your attention.

That may be effected in one of two ways, viz. either by an order in council, opening the British ports to American vessels after a certain day, in the event of the United States having before that time complied with the conditions of the act of Parliament of the 5th of July, 1825, by opening our ports to the admission of British vessels, and allowing their entry with the same kind of British or colonial produce as may be imported in American vessels, the vessels of both countries paying the same charges; by suspending the alien duties on British vessels and cargoes, and by abolishing the restrictions in our act of 1823 to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British colonies—thus leaving Great Britain in possession of the circuitous trade between Great Britain proper and the United States, through the British colonies. Or, the President will recommend the same measures to Congress at their next session, on being assured by the British Government that the passage of an act of Congress to that effect will lead to the revocation of the British order in council of July, 1827, to the abolition or suspension of all discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonial ports, and to the enjoyment by us of the advantages of the last mentioned act of Parliament.

You are authorized to agree to either mode, but the former is, for many reasons, to be preferred. In all that is said upon the subject, it must be borne in mind that the President, whatever may be his wishes, or the course he might otherwise adopt, has no authority to move in the matter without the aid of Congress. The only laws relating to this subject, now in force, are the acts of 1818 and 1820, by virtue of which our ports are closed against the admission of British vessels engaged in the colonial trade. They do not confer a dispensing power on the President, and he has no such authority derived from any other source.

Some explanatory act, or a stipulation having a prospective view to such provision as Congress may make, will certainly be necessary to enable the United States to avail themselves of the privileges offered by the act of Parliament of 1825. By that act we are required, as a condition to the enjoyment of its advantages, to place the commerce and navigation of Great Britain and her possessions abroad upon the footing of the most favored nation. If it is meant by the condition that the commerce and navigation of Great Britain, and of her possessions abroad, shall be gratuitously and generally placed on the same footing with those of the most favored nation, by granting to them privileges which are allowed by us to other nations for equivalents received, it would be wholly inadmissible.

By the laws of both countries, the vessels of each are prohibited from importing into the ports of the other any other productions than those of the country to which such vessels respectively belong. By the laws of the United States, this restriction is applied only to those countries which apply a similar interdict to our commerce. Almost all other countries have excluded it from their navigation codes: such nations, therefore, enjoy the privilege of importing from any country upon paying our alien duties—a privilege which we cannot extend to Great Britain, because her laws deny it to us.

Our discriminating duties, also, have, in consequence of arrangements by treaty, been abolished as to certain nations, and their vessels and cargoes admitted on equal terms with those of the United States. We have, moreover, treaties with Central America and Denmark, by which it is stipulated that whatever can be imported to, or exported from, either country, from or to any foreign place, in its own vessels, may be so imported or exported in the vessels of the other country, on the payment of the same duties. Should the terms "most favored nation" be understood by Great Britain in the sense I have referred to, she would entitle herself, in case of a literal compliance on our part with the terms of the act of 1825, to all those privileges for her European navigation and commerce, without reciprocating them to the United States—a privilege she would, it is hoped, be too just to desire, and which, certainly, the United States could not for a moment think of granting. The force of these objections, and the necessity of preliminary explanations upon this head proceeding from the British Government, was virtually admitted by Lord Dudley, in his reply to Mr. Gallatin's notes of the 4th of June and 17th of July, 1826; but he considered them as answered by the statement of Mr. Gallatin, that the President was willing to recommend certain specific measures to Congress, as a fulfillment of the conditions of the act of 1825, and the President would have adopted them himself if he had been clothed with authority to that effect.

The simple and sufficient reply to this view of the matter is, that those measures were proposed by the United States, not as a strict compliance with the conditions required, but as all that they could offer, and with an accompanying declaration that they fell short of what the act of 1825 required, and would still leave our commerce with the colonies dependent upon the future dispensation of the British Government. The validity of this opinion Lord Dudley did not attempt to controvert.

If it is then true that either further preliminary legislative acts, or a prospective stipulation on the part of Great Britain, be necessary, a previous order in council should be preferred: First. Because it would obviate the two principal objections stated by Lord Dudley to her binding herself for the future. Those objections were, that the future course of Great Britain must, necessarily, in part, depend upon the details of such act as Congress might pass; and that the very fact of making such a stipulation would be a departure from a ground which their Government had taken upon full deliberation, that they would not suffer themselves to be drawn into any negotiation upon the subject of the colonial trade, but claimed for themselves the right to regulate it by their own separate and independent legislative acts. The mode proposed would manifestly obviate the first objection, and avoid the other. Secondly. Because such an act on the part of Great Britain, after the past transactions of the two Governments on this subject, could not fail to remove all asperities from the minds of our people, and contribute more than an adjustment in any other form to produce that spirit of mutual kindness between the two countries which it is the interest of both to cherish, and which the President is earnestly solicitous to maintain.

Assuming that the step can be taken by Great Britain (as it assuredly can) without disparagement, the consideration stated would, it is believed, have a persuasive influence on her conduct. In issuing such an order in council, the British Government would only be acting upon the same policy which it has in part already pursued in relation to the Bahama islands and the island of Anguilla. Great Britain revoked her order in council of July, 1827, as to those islands, because it was required by a due regard to her interests. That being ascertained, no consideration of form or matter of feeling was allowed to interfere. What good reason can be assigned why the same should not be done for the maintenance of greater interests, and under more eligible circumstances? Should that mode, however, be declined, it is hoped that the only remaining one will be adopted without hesitation.

I will add nothing as to the impropriety of suffering any feelings that find their origin in the past pretensions of this Government to have an adverse influence upon the present conduct of Great Britain. Without such an assurance on her part, your mission, so far as relates to the colonial trade, must be wholly inoperative. If this result is produced by a real change of opinion on the part of the British ministry with respect to the reciprocal advantages of the trade, and a determination to exclude the United States from it, in order to promote her own interests, and that is frankly and promptly avowed, the whole matter will be at least intelligibly concluded. If, however, they are not prepared to take this ground, but suffer themselves to desire that the United States should, in expiation of supposed past encroachments, be driven to the necessity of retracing their legislative steps, without knowledge of its effect, and wholly dependent upon the indulgence of Great Britain, they cannot be insensible of the extreme improbability that any further measure will be taken by Congress, before whom (in the event alluded to) it would probably be the pleasure of the President to lay the whole matter.

Extract of a letter, dated 5th August, 1829, from Mr. Van Buren to Mr. McLane, then at New York.

I forgot to speak to you upon the subject of the probable impression that will be made upon the British ministry by the rumors and speculations that have appeared here in regard to the character of your instructions, and to suggest the importance of putting them informally, but fully and early, in possession of your views upon that point.

Mr. McLane to the Earl of Aberdeen.

9, CHANDOS STREET, CAVENDISH SQUARE,
December 12, 1829.

MY LORD: I had flattered myself with the hope of receiving before this time a decisive answer from his Majesty's Government to the propositions which I had the honor to make some time since for an arrangement of the trade between the United States and the British American colonies; but, while I regret the delay that has taken place, I am aware that it has hitherto been unavoidable. In the hope, however, that, after the various conversations which I have had the honor to hold with his Majesty's ministers in the course of this negotiation, they may be prepared definitively to dispose of the subject, I beg leave to make your lordship the present communication.

In entering upon the negotiation, I separated this from the other objects of my mission, and presented it singly before his Majesty's ministers, that it might receive their early consideration and prompt decision, and that I might thereby the better promote the views and wishes of my Government. I early informed your lordship of the anxious desire of the President of the United States that the question may be put immediately and entirely at rest. In this he is influenced not merely by a wish to liberate and give activity to such portion of the capital of his fellow-citizens as may be awaiting the decision of this question, but also by the higher motive of speedily terminating a state of things daily becoming more prejudicial to the friendly relations of the two countries.

Disclaiming, on the part of the United States, in reply to certain observations of your lordship, all hostility to this country in their system of protecting duties, and disconnecting that system from any arrangement of this particular question, I endeavored to lay this subject before his Majesty's ministers divested of all considerations but such as peculiarly relate to this branch of the commerce between the two nations.

Conceiving that experience had already proved the existing colonial regulations to be injurious to the interests of both countries, the President was induced to hope that true policy alone would dispose his Majesty's Government to change them. He could perceive no good reason why Great Britain should now refuse her assent to the terms of arrangement which she herself had heretofore voluntarily proposed; and, as the order in council of July, 1826, did not embrace Russia and Sweden, though both were within the scope of the act of 1825, and as it had been subsequently rescinded as to Spain without equivalent, he was unwilling to suppose that any unfriendly motive could induce a peculiar and permanent exclusion of the United States from participation in a trade thus conceded to the rest of the world.

In fact it appeared that a material alteration had taken place in the colonial system, and in the relations between the two countries, produced by the recent relaxation of the order in council in favor of Spain, which left the United States the sole excluded power, and by the injurious operation of the existing regulations upon the interests of Great Britain. It was not unreasonable, therefore, to suppose that the negotiation might be advantageously resumed; that the British Government might be induced to rescind entirely their order in council of 1826, and that a satisfactory arrangement might immediately be made by the reciprocal acts of both Governments.

In the course of my negotiation, however, I have met with difficulties much greater than had been anticipated. There were objections opposed to any arrangement. Among these were the measures of the United States restricting the British colonial commerce subsequently to their failure to accept the terms offered by the act of Parliament of 1825, and the claims to protection urged by those interests which are supposed to have grown up in faith of the act of 1825, and the order in council of 1826. Indeed, I distinctly understood that these were insuperable obstacles to any relaxation in the colonial system of Great Britain, unless some previous change should be made in the legislation of the United States.

With this understanding, though I by no means admitted the force of these objections, I deemed it expedient, in this state of the negotiation, to make the following proposition: That the Government of the United States should now comply with the conditions of the act of Parliament of July 5, 1825, by an express law opening their ports for the admission of British vessels, and by allowing their entry with the same kind of British colonial produce as may be imported in American vessels, the vessels of both countries paying the same charges; suspending the alien duties on British vessels and cargoes, and abolishing the restrictions in the act of Congress of 1823 to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British colonies; and that such a law should be immediately followed by a revocation of the British order in council of the 27th July, 1826, the abolition or suspension of all discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonial ports, and the enjoyment, by the United States, of the advantages of the act of Parliament of the 5th of July, 1825.

By this offer on the part of my Government, I hoped to remove even the pretence of complaint against its measures; and I trusted that, in thus throwing open, by its own act, to all of his Majesty's subjects, a trade at present enjoyed by but a few, it would effectually silence those partial interests which, springing out of a system of restriction, and depending as much upon the countervailing laws of the United States as upon the regulations of their own Government, subsist entirely upon the misfortunes of the British West India planters, and the embarrassments of the general commercial capital and enterprise of both nations.

In repeating the proposition, as I now have the honor to do, and in renewing my solicitation that it may be taken into early and candid consideration, and produce a prompt and favorable reply, I refrain from leading to further discussion and delay by a more detailed reference to the various suggestions by which, in the course of the negotiation, I have had the honor to recommend it.

Entertaining, however, the conviction I have heretofore expressed, of the wasting effects of the present regulations upon the substantial interest of the two countries, I cannot close this letter without again remarking that delay can only tend to increase the difficulties on both sides to any future adjustment, and that it will be difficult for the United States to reconcile the marked and invidious relation in which they are now placed with their idea of justice, or with the amicable professions of this Government. That relation involves consequences reaching far beyond the immediate subject in discussion, and of infinitely greater importance to the future intercourse of both countries than any value which the trade affected by these regulations may be supposed to possess.

It is this view of the subject which unites the sympathy of all interests in the United States with their commercial enterprise, which touches the pride and sensibility of every class of their population, and which, I trust, will make its due appeal to the candor and liberality of his Majesty's Government.

I pray your lordship to accept the assurance of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be your lordship's most obedient and very humble servant,

LOUIS McLANE.

To the Right Honorable the Earl of ABERDEEN, &c.

The Earl of Aberdeen to Mr. McLane.

FOREIGN OFFICE, December 14, 1829.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 12th instant, formally recording the desire entertained by the Government of the United States (and previously declared by you in verbal conferences) for the removal of the existing restrictions on the intercourse between the British West India colonies and the United States, with the view of placing the commerce of the two countries on a footing more consonant with the substantial interests of both nations, and with the amicable relations which happily subsist between them.

I shall lose no time in bringing the propositions contained in your letter under the consideration of his Majesty's Government.

Whatever may be the result of their deliberations on this question, of which you are already apprised of some of the difficulties, you may be assured that his Majesty's Government will enter into the consideration of it with the most friendly feelings towards the Government of the United States.

21st Cong. 2d Sess.]

Trade with British Colonies.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

ABERDEEN.

LOUIS McLANE, Esq. &c.

*Mr. Van Buren to Mr. McLane.*DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 26, 1829.

Your despatch No. 5 has been duly received, and submitted to the President. From subsequent but unofficial information, he is induced to believe that the British cabinet are disposed to reciprocate the liberal views by which he is himself actuated, by the adoption of some just and equally beneficial arrangement in regard to the colonial trade: but that, for reasons applicable to their side only, they desire a short delay before a final decision is made upon the subject. Confiding in the sincerity of the professions which are understood to have been made to you, and equally anxious to remove all grounds of uneasiness between the two countries, the President has directed me to communicate to you his views in regard to the question of time. This shall be done in the same frank and friendly spirit which characterizes your general instructions in this regard, and which has left in them nothing that requires concealment. Not foreseeing any difficulty or embarrassment to the British Government in coming to a prompt decision upon that branch of the subject of difference between the two countries, you were instructed to ask for such decision at as early a period as should be found consistent with perfect respect and courtesy. The motive of this Government for pursuing that course was avowed to consist in a belief that no practical good could result from a protracted discussion of matters already so fully debated, and in a desire to communicate the result, whatever it might be, to Congress, for its own action, and the information of its constituents. The explanations which are understood to have been made to you by the leading members of the British cabinet, are, however, sufficient to induce the President to acquiesce in a compliance, on your part, with their wishes in regard to time, provided the proposed delay be not such as to defeat the expressed views of this Government in case of a result adverse to its wishes. For the probable length of the present session, and the period at which the President ought to be possessed of the final decision of the British Government, to enable him to lay it before Congress in due season, your own judgment and knowledge of circumstances may, with safety, be relied upon. The reasons for doing so at an early period are very strong; but the President is disposed to content himself, under existing circumstances, with any course which will enable him to protect the interests of this country from the injuries that might result from long delay. Your intimate acquaintance with the whole subject renders it unnecessary for me to enter into a particular consideration of the measures which would, most probably, be regarded by this Government as proper and expedient, on our part, in the event of an entire failure of the negotiation, and enables you to form a proper estimate of the value of time in respect to the utility of their adoption. You will be governed, accordingly, by a view of all these circumstances, as to the extent of the proposed delay which would be acceptable here, in reference to the adjustment of this important interest.

Independently of the steps necessary and practicable to open and improve new channels for the trade which would thus be permanently abandoned, the justice and propriety of defeating the interested views of the Northern British colonies is a subject which is earnestly pressed upon the consideration of this Government.

The desire so strongly manifested in that quarter to give permanency to a state of things altogether artificial in its character, and as much at variance with the repeated and solemn opinions of both Governments as with the best interests of the two countries, has excited much sensibility here; and the active agency which that interest is understood to exercise in thwarting your efforts to place matters on their only natural and true footing, serves greatly to increase that feeling. The propriety of an immediate legislative provision, prohibiting our trade with the Canadas, and other free ports, after a certain day, if the present colonial regulations of Great Britain should at that time remain unchanged, is strongly advocated; but the President is disinclined to bring that subject to the notice of Congress during the pendency of your negotiation, by the apprehension that the step might, under these circumstances, be regarded as wearing the appearance of menace, and thus give an acrimonious character to a negotiation which it is his wish should be of the most kind and amicable nature.

It is hoped that the President's message will aid the liberal views which the principal members of the British cabinet are understood to entertain upon this point, by disabusing the mind of the English public in regard to the views and wishes of this country, and by impressing it with just notions of the sentiments of the President. There certainly never was a time better calculated for the improvement of the relations between the two countries than the present. The solicitude sincerely felt by the President upon this head, is greater than the occasion referred to would allow him to express: and I am persuaded that there has been no event in his public life that has caused him as much regret as he would experience in failing to be instrumental in the establishment of the very best understanding between the United States and Great Britain.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,
M. VAN BUREN.

*Mr. McLane to the Earl of Aberdeen.*9, CHANDOS STREET, PORTLAND PLACE, London, March 16, 1830.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America, in calling the attention of the Earl of Aberdeen, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to a proposition which he had the honor to submit in writing on the 12th of December last, for an arrangement of the trade between the United States and the British American colonies, and in praying for a decision thereupon, is influenced, not merely by considerations of duty, urging him to avoid further delay, but by a hope that the time already afforded for deliberation has been sufficient to enable his Majesty's ministers to judge of the reasonableness of his demands.

The Earl of Aberdeen is already aware that, whatever may be the disposition which his Majesty's Government may now be pleased to make of this subject, it must necessarily be final, and indicative of the policy to which it will be necessary, in future, to adapt the commercial relations of each country. As the regulations on the part of the United States which will follow the decision of this Government can be adopted by the Congress alone, it becomes the duty of the undersigned to ascertain and transmit such decision during the present session of that legislative body. But, while the undersigned again solicits the earliest convenient answer to his proposition, he cannot but repeat that it will be happy for both countries if their measures shall coincide in cultivating those liberal principles of mutual accommodation which are the elements of common prosperity and united strength.

However the fact may be regretted and condemned by enlightened statesmen, it cannot be concealed that ancient prejudices and unworthy animosities do still linger among the people of both countries; and the Earl of Aberdeen has been too distinguished an observer of events, not to perceive the operation of those causes in fostering a spirit of commercial jealousy, especially in relation to the colonial trade.

It should be the desire, as it is the interest, of both Governments to extinguish these causes of mutual bitterness; to correct the errors which may have interrupted the harmony of their past intercourse; to discard from their commercial regulations measures of hostile monopoly; and to adopt, instead, a generous system of frank and amicable competition.

There has never occurred, in the history of the two countries, a fairer opportunity than the present to effect this desirable object; and the undersigned feels pleasure in remarking the favorable disposition professed by both Governments on the subject. He begs to suggest, however, that this period of amicable expressions deserves also to be signalized by acts of mutual concession, which may remain to the people of both countries as earnest of those liberal relations which their Governments have resolved to cultivate. Such would be embraced in the proposition which the undersigned has already had the honor to submit; namely, that the United States should do now that which they might have done in 1825—rescind the measures which may be alleged to have contributed to the present evil, and repeal the laws which have been matters of complaint; and that England should assent now to a measure which, but a few years since, she herself proposed.

The undersigned is unwilling to pass from this topic without reassuring the Earl of Aberdeen that it is from considerations of this kind that the subject derives its highest importance in the view of his Government. There is no disposition to deny the injurious effects of the existing regulations upon the commercial and navigating enterprise of the people of the United States, associated, as it evidently is, with the substantial prosperity of the British West India colonies. Much of the injury, however, and especially that arising from the temporary inactivity of a portion of American capital, might soon be remedied by acts of the Legislature, opening new channels for commercial enterprise. But the evil most to be apprehended is, that, in recurring, on both sides, to the remedy of legislative enactments, a spirit of competition might be immediately awakened, which, however dispassionately it might commence, would be too apt, in a little while, to become angry and retaliating. In cases of the kind, as has been too well proved, one step necessarily leads to another, each tending more and more to estrange the two nations, and to produce mutual injuries, deeply to be deplored when they can no longer be remedied.

It is far from the intention of the undersigned to intimate that the United States could be disposed to complain of any commercial regulation of Great Britain, which, by a system of reasonable preference, should consult the interests of her own subjects, provided it were done in a spirit of amity and impartiality, and that it should place all nations on an equal footing. But, when the United States shall think they have grounds to consider themselves singled out from all other nations, and made the exclusive object of an injurious regulation; when they shall imagine it levelled at their prosperity alone, either in retaliation of past deeds, or for interested purposes—to secure some adventitious advantage, or to encourage a hostile competition, by means of commercial monopoly; however justifiable, in such case, they may admit the regulation to be, in point of strict right, they will hardly be able to refrain, not merely from complaint, but from a course of measures calculated, as they may think, to avert the intended injury, though pregnant, perhaps, with consequences to be ultimately lamented.

While the undersigned would, in no degree, impair the full force of these considerations, he would, at the same time, be distinctly understood as not employing the language of menace. He has conducted his whole negotiation with an unfeigned and anxious desire to see the relations of the two countries placed on a footing equally advantageous and honorable to both, as the only means of ensuring lasting amity; but, being profoundly sensible of the causes by which this desirable object may be defeated, he has framed his proposition in such a manner as to enable his Majesty's ministers to co-operate in his views, without departing from the principles of their system of colonial trade and government. To this effect, the proposition which he has had the honor to submit concedes to Great Britain the right of regulating the trade with her colonies according to her own interests, and asks no exemption from the discriminating duties which she has instituted in favor of her own possessions. It invites a participation in a direct, rather than a circuitous trade, upon terms which Great Britain deliberately adopted in 1825 as beneficial to her colonies, and which she continues to the present day to allow to all the rest of the world. A rejection of it, therefore, would appear to result, not from any condemnation of the direct trade, or any conviction of the impolicy of permitting it with the West India colonies, but rather from a determination of excluding from it the commerce of the United States alone.

It is not the intention of the undersigned to undertake here the difficult task of minutely recapitulating on paper the various suggestions by which, in the course of his conferences with his Majesty's ministers, he has endeavored to enforce an arrangement on the terms heretofore stated. He trusts, however, to be excused, if, in making this last application for an early decision, he should recur to a few of the more leading considerations connected with the present state of the negotiation.

And here the undersigned begs leave to observe, that, whatever hope he may have indulged on this subject at any period of the negotiation, it has been founded, not so much upon the expectation of peculiar favor to the United States, as of a liberal compliance, by His Majesty's Government, with its own regulations, in allowing the United States to participate in a trade permitted to all the rest of the world, so far as their participation should contribute to the purposes for which such trade was, in any manner, authorized.

The arrangement, therefore, proposed by the undersigned, does not urge upon the British Government a departure from what may be considered its ordinary colonial regulations, for the benefit of the United States, but a recurrence to a course of trade beneficial alike to the commerce of the United States and the colonial interests of Great Britain, and which has been interrupted by causes not foreseen by the latter, and highly disadvantageous to both nations.

It was the hope of the undersigned, that, if the interests of that portion of the British dominions which, in the sixth year of his present Majesty's reign, dictated the regulations proposed by the act of Parliament of that year, could be subserved by their adoption now, Great Britain would not be prevented, by any causes accidentally or improvidently arising, or by any exclusive policy towards the United States, from renewing now the offer she then made.

The undersigned is not disposed to deny that any departure from the rigid policy by which the colonies are excluded from all commercial intercourse, except with the mother country, must be founded on the interests of the colonies themselves, and it will be doubtless conceded that such was the object of the regulations proposed by the act of Parliament of 1825, which were intended to furnish the British West India islands with a more extensive market for their productions, and with the means of supplying themselves, on the cheapest terms, with all articles of foreign produce of which they might stand in need.

The act of 1825 was, in fact, a relaxation of the previous policy, affording to the West India colonies advantages of trade which they had not previously enjoyed, and offering the benefit of their commerce to all the world. It will scarcely be denied that this relaxation was dictated by a wise regard for the peculiar wants of those islands. Abundant proof of this may be found in the reciprocal privileges granted at the same time to the other possessions of Great Britain, the interests of which might be supposed to be affected by these regulations; and more especially in the privileges conferred on the Northern possessions, of introducing their grain into England at a fixed and moderate duty, and of receiving in exchange, and importing directly from all parts of the world, productions similar to those of the West India islands; and also in the reduction of the duty on the Mauritius sugar, in the ports of Great Britain, to an equality with that on the West India sugar.

It will scarcely be doubted that these privileges were fully commensurate with the object. Indeed, it must be perceived that they were of extensive scope and growing importance, materially affecting the present and prospective trade of the West India planters. They conferred on the Northern possessions a free and direct trade, not only with the European ports, but with the continent of South America, in which are countries daily increasing in resources, and destined, beyond a doubt, when the advantages of their soil and climate shall be properly cultivated, to become rival growers of the West India produce.

It may be safely affirmed that these are privileges of greater magnitude than any conferred by the same act on the West India islands; and it is worthy of remark, that they are still enjoyed by those possessions, constituting a source of profit and prosperity; while of those for which they were given as an equivalent, the West India planter has been almost ever since deprived.

It could not be imagined that the remotest forethought was entertained of this state of things, by which the West India islands would ultimately be deprived of their most natural and profitable market, and their interests sacrificed to the adventitious prosperity of possessions which already, in the privileges heretofore alluded to, and in the scale of discriminating duties provided by the act of Parliament, enjoyed advantages equivalent to any accorded by the protecting policy of Great Britain. Much less could the undersigned permit himself to suppose that the act of 1825 contemplated any other objects than those which it ostensibly imported, or that those objects could be permanently defeated by accidental causes.

The undersigned need not here enter into a particular defence of the omission on the part of the United States seasonably to embrace the offer of the direct trade made by Great Britain in the year 1825, and to which allusion has so frequently been made. Whether it be a subject more of regret or of censure, it ought to be enough that the claims advanced in justification of it have since been abandoned by those who made them, have received no sanction from the people of the United States, and that they are not now revived. If it be the intention of Great Britain to perpetuate the present state of things from a belief that it is more for her interest, she will require no warrant from the past; and if she intend it for any other purpose, the mistakes of the past will not justify a policy observed towards the United States alone, while unenforced against other nations chargeable with similar neglect. If these mistakes have led to the mutual injury of both countries, there ought rather to be inspired a disposition to remedy such injury, and to prevent its future recurrence.

The undersigned, therefore, may be content to admit that, in consequence of the failure by the past administration of the Government of the United States to comply with the provisions of the act of Parliament of 1825, by repealing certain restrictions in their laws deemed incompatible with the interests of the colonies, Great Britain thought proper, by order in council, to exclude them from the direct trade authorized by that act. But it cannot, therefore, be supposed that they were thus excluded because Great Britain had repented of the regulations of 1825, which she continued to extend to all other nations, though some of them, too, had neglected the conditions of that act; neither could it be supposed that the importance of a direct trade with the United States had in any degree diminished.

It is not a fair inference from any measure, neither is it avowed on the face of any public document of Great Britain, that, by the interdict applied by the order in council, she intended, permanently and unchangeably, to deprive the United States and her West India islands of the benefit of a direct trade, which had always been deemed of the first importance to both. The opposite is the natural inference; and it is due to the character of Great Britain, and to her knowledge of her true interests, to believe that the adjustment of trade with her several possessions by the act of 1825, was, in her opinion, salutary, and that she ought to secure it in every part, and to give it more complete effect, by her order in council, the true intent of which was to exclude the United States from the direct trade merely until they should consent to engage in it on terms mutually advantageous. It was thus, whilst her other possessions were left in the enjoyment of their privileges, Great Britain intended to secure to the West India islands the commercial benefits which had been designed for them by these regulations.

Nor are the answers heretofore given by this Government in the course of previous negotiations, incompatible with this interpretation of the order in council. After applying the interdict for the purposes of the act of 1825, it was not unreasonable that the time of its removal should be adapted to the same ends. It might have been designed, not merely to evince the predilection of Great Britain for regulations adopted in 1825, but to manifest to all other nations the mutual advantages of that course of trade, and to yield to a liberal spirit when that effect should be produced. The language of the late Mr. Canning, and of Lord Dudley, authorizes this belief. Mr. Canning said no more than that the British Government would not feel bound to remove the interdict, as a matter of course, whenever it might suit a foreign nation to reconsider her measures; implying, surely, that, under other circumstances, our overture would not be rejected. In the negotiation with Mr. Canning, moreover, the American pretensions, which, before that time, had embarrassed an arrangement, were not conceded; and on that ground, particularly, Mr. Gallatin's proposition was then declined. At the time of the negotiation with Lord Dudley, neither party had felt the effects of a state of things which neither had ever contemplated, and for which Great Britain had never, until then, manifested any desire.

Without attempting here to point out the error of Lord Dudley's conception of Mr. Gallatin's proposition, the undersigned contents himself with suggesting that his answer most particularly referred to the proposition merely in regard to the form and the time. It neither said nor intimated, as, had such been the intention, it unquestionably would have done, that Great Britain designed, by the order in council, permanently to abandon the objects of her act of 1825.

It must be admitted that such inference would be incompatible with the views entertained by the present ministry, as expressed in the order in council of 1828, gratuitously extending and continuing to Spain the privileges granted by the act of 1825, which she, also, had forfeited, by failing, up to that period, to comply with the conditions.

On no supposition, consistent with ordinary impartiality towards a friendly nation, can this order be reconciled, than that the whole subject rested in the discretion of the ministry, to be changed and modified at any time when they might deem it expedient.

The undersigned, therefore, takes leave to suppose that the present state of things is new and unexpected in the colonial history of Great Britain; that the interests and advantages dependent upon it are adventitious, subordinate, if not opposed, to the objects of the act of Parliament of 1825, and injurious to the interests contemplated by that act; and that it was neither intended to be produced nor perpetuated by the order in council of 1826. He is induced, therefore, by these considerations, to renew his hope that the real purposes of that order may now be fulfilled, and the cardinal object of the act of 1825 effectually promoted.

He would venture to ask, moreover, whether those interests which have recently sprung up out of this adventitious state of things, which depend upon accidental causes, and subsist upon the sufferings of others more ancient in standing, and at least equal in magnitude, have any peculiar claim to be upheld. They connected themselves with a course of trade subversive of the leading motives of the act of 1825, and necessarily temporary, and which it would be unreasonable to convert into a permanent arrangement, unless it could be proved that it had attained, or was likely to attain, in some other way, all the objects contemplated by that act.

The regulations of the sixth year of his present Majesty's reign were not adopted without reason, or uncalled for by the condition of the West India colonies. The improvident legislation with which their trade with the United States has been unhappily restricted, subsequently to the year 1822, had produced embarrassments which all acknowledged, and which the measures of 1825 proposed to obviate, by extending the market for their productions, and enlarging the means of a cheap supply.

Such, it must be admitted, was the obvious remedy for the evil; and, if their own picture of actual distress and embarrassment be not overdrawn, the situation of the West India planters is more in need of its application at present than in the year 1825. Seldom, indeed, if ever, have their distresses been more intense, or their supplications for relief more urgent.

It is also true that, according to usual custom in periods of public distress, the evils which now afflict the West India planters have been ascribed to causes various in their nature, and not always consistent. For evils of general prevalence, however, there is always some cause of general and uniform operation; and it certainly is not unfair to argue that the same circumstances which have led to such a calamitous state of things at one period, may lead to similar effects at another; therefore, that an aggravation of those causes which produced the embarrassments prevalent from 1822 to 1825, may produce the same, in a still more oppressive degree, at present, and may render them insupportable hereafter.

That there is an immense reduction in the value of colonial produce, is not a matter of conjectural speculation. It will not be denied that it has been taking place gradually since the interruption of the direct trade, until it may be affirmed that the nett proceeds of a single hogshead of sugar are less, by ten pounds sterling, than they were in the last year.

It is not a matter of doubt to the undersigned that the total loss to the West India planters of a direct trade with the United States, the most natural source of their supplies, and the most profitable market for their productions, by enhancing the price of the one, and not merely lowering the price, but diminishing the quantity of the other, is sufficient, without the aid of other causes which might be cited, to produce a state of distress greater even than that of which they at present complain.

The Earl of Aberdeen will scarcely need be informed that the consumption, in the United States, of West India produce is very considerable; but it may not be superfluous to state that, of foreign sugar alone, it is certainly little less than sixty millions of pounds per annum; of foreign molasses, it is not less than thirteen millions of gallons; and of foreign rum, it is equal to three millions and a half; and yet, in consequence of the present embarrassments of the direct trade, the importation of British West India produce has substantially ceased.

It does not appear, in the mean time, that the planter has been indemnified for his loss by any other market. In that of London, he certainly has not: it neither requires the surplus produce thus left on the hands of the planter, nor offers him an equal price for that which it consumes.

The freight to New York is one shilling, and to London five shillings per hundred weight; the difference of insurance between the two places, also, is as one to six per cent. The price of sugar, therefore, ought to be proportionably higher in the London market. The Earl of Aberdeen will perceive, however, by a reference to the prices current of Philadelphia, Boston, and London, already submitted to his inspection, that, instead of being greater, the price is less in the market of London than in that of the United States. The sugar of St. Croix, which is of an inferior quality to that of Jamaica, is quoted in the prices current of the United States at from eight to ten dollars and fifty cents per hundred weight; and while the price of nine dollars and fifty cents, after deducting freight and duty, would nett twenty-five shillings sterling, the prices in London, it is believed, do not nett more than twenty-two shillings per hundred weight, for sugar of similar quality. The undersigned begs leave also to remark, that an examination of the same prices current, for the purpose of comparing the prices of the lower qualities of sugar, as well as of rum, would present a more striking disparity in favor of the market of the United States.

It may not be necessary to assert the impossibility of supplying the West India islands at present without the aid, directly or indirectly, of the United States. If this were not the case, unless the supplies could be drawn from other possessions of Great Britain, the undersigned will not imagine that there could be any motive or pretence, as between other nations, to exclude the United States, more especially as it is not likely that any other nation could furnish them on terms equally advantageous.

But the undersigned may assert with perfect safety, that, for a great portion of their principal supplies, especially flour, Indian meal, rice, boards, staves, and shingles, the West India islands must be, for a long time, dependent upon the United States; for rice, in fact, they must always be so. The proximity of the United States and the West India islands to each other; the adaptation of their productions to their mutual wants; the capacity of the United States to furnish the principal articles of provisions, at all seasons, in a fresh state, and by a cheap navigation; and, above all, the extent and steadfastness of their demand for the island productions, not only constitute them the best customers of the planters, but give them advantages for such a trade not possessed by any other nation. Even the British Northern possessions, if in fact they were equally capable of producing the necessary articles, could not enter into competition upon equal terms. The physical impediments which, for at least half the year, embarrass their intercourse with the islands, compel the latter, during that time, to look elsewhere for any immediate supplies of which they may stand in need.

Not to dwell too minutely on this point, the undersigned will content himself with referring to the general course and extent of this trade in all past times; to the value of the supplies uniformly furnished by the United States, under all the disadvantages of a restricted and embarrassed intercourse; and to the vast amount which is even now finding its way through indirect and difficult, and consequently expensive channels, under a positive and total interdiction of the direct trade. Surely if other parts, with which the trade is not merely direct, but highly favored, were actually able, from their own resources and productions, to furnish these supplies, there would be no recourse for them to the United States.

The undersigned is unable to speak with precision of the amount of provisions and other articles actually supplied from the United States in the present course of business. There is a difficulty in tracing the trade through the numerous channels into which it has been diverted from its natural course. Tabular statements are not, in all respects, full and accurate; especially when they relate to merchandise transported across the frontier lines, and passing down the St. Lawrence to the Northern possessions; of such there being but little, if any, account taken in the custom-houses.

These circumstances render all conclusions on this subject more or less matters of conjecture. It is the opinion, however, of the most intelligent persons engaged in the trade, both before and since the order in council of 1826, and an opinion which, it is believed, cannot be controverted, that an amount equal to more than a half of that heretofore exported through the direct channels still continues to go by the present circuitous routes. It has even been asserted by intelligent commercial men, that Jamaica has not consumed less of the flour, and provisions generally, of the United States, though at an additional and oppressive expense, than when the trade was direct. The routes through which these supplies now pass comprehend not merely the Northern possessions, which have the solitary advantage of occasionally affording a better assortment of goods, but the islands of St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew, Martinique, Guadeloupe, and the port of St. Jago de Cuba.

It is believed that those facts will be fully sustained, so far as certain official returns in the archives of this Government, to which the undersigned has had access, may be relied on. One of these, being a comparative account of the quantity of provisions and lumber imported into the British West Indies in the years 1825 and 1828, the undersigned has already submitted to the Earl of Aberdeen as deserving of particular attention. It would appear from this, that, of the corn and grain imported into those islands in 1825, amounting to 383,332 bushels, 237,248 bushels were introduced from the United States, 7,012 from the British colonies in North America, 9,249 from the foreign West Indies, 1,584 from foreign Europe, and the remainder from the United Kingdom, and the islands of Jersey and Guernsey; thus constituting the United States, in the regular course of the trade, the natural and cheapest source of supply. It also appears that in the year 1828, of the aggregate importation, then reduced to 351,832 bushels, 27 bushels only were introduced directly from the United States; but, from the foreign West Indies, 126,221; from the British colonies in North America, 45,495; from foreign Europe, 464; and from the United Kingdom, &c. 172,718 bushels.

In 1825, there were imported into the same islands 202,737 barrels of meal and flour; of which the United States supplied directly 161,568; the British colonies in North America, 4,232; foreign Europe, 400; foreign West Indies, 21,090, and the United Kingdom, &c. 15,447 barrels. In 1828, the aggregate importation of the same articles was 206,653 barrels; of which the United States sent directly 940 barrels, and the foreign West Indies, 142,092; the British colonies in North America, 36,766; foreign Europe, 1,135, and the United Kingdom, 25,331.

A similar result is more strikingly presented in the article of rice; and it is also shown by the same account, that, of the amount of lumber introduced since the interruption of the direct trade, nearly one-half of the most valuable kinds, which previously went directly from the United States, passed through the foreign West Indies; of shingles considerably more than one-half; and of staves, a greater number were imported from the foreign West Indies in 1828, than were introduced directly from the United States in 1825.

It will not escape the attention of the Earl of Aberdeen that the foreign West Indies derive their means of exporting these articles principally, if not exclusively, from the United States; and that, while the importance to the planters of their direct trade with the latter is thus exemplified by these statements, it is also shown that the diversion of it into indirect and circuitous channels does not confer equally substantial advantages upon the British Northern colonies.

With this view of the subject, the undersigned takes leave to ask, why may not these supplies, which must thus necessarily be drawn from the United States, be furnished by means of a direct trade? It must be admitted that the evils of the indirect trade fall upon the planters. Among these may be considered the charges of double freight and insurance, the expenses of transhipment, and the commissions and duties in the neutral islands, estimated at fifty per centum on the first cost of lumber, and from fifteen to twenty per centum on provisions. So far as this estimate relates to lumber, it is fully warranted by the official account of the comparative prices of that article in Jamaica in the years 1825 and 1828, already submitted to the Earl of Aberdeen; and, as it respects provisions, the duty of five shillings per barrel on flour, and in proportion on other articles, as completely sustains it. But to these evils, great as they are, must be added the total loss of the market offered by the United States under a direct trade, the extent and advantages of which have already been shown, and would have continued for an indefinite length of time, if not interrupted by these restrictions.

It is true the cultivation of sugar had been commenced, and is extending in the United States, but under difficulties and impediments arising from the nature of the climate, and the frequent injury of the crops by the variability of the seasons. It has to contend, also, with the superiority, if not the indispensable necessity of foreign sugar for the purpose of the refiner. The demand of the latter is steadfast and increasing, being commensurate, not merely with the consumption of refined sugar in the United States, but the growing trade in it with all parts of the world. The exportation of refined sugar has also been further encouraged by a recent augmentation of the drawback, placing it on an equal footing with domestic sugar in respect to foreign markets. Under these circumstances, while the direct trade remained open, there would, as has been said, have continued a great and augmenting demand for the West India sugars for an indefinite length of time. The present restrictions, however, menace the planter with its total loss, if, in fact, they have not already ensured it. In proportion as they augment the embarrassments and expense of the trade with the British West India islands, they compel the United States to grow their own sugar, and act as bounties to encourage and improve its cultivation; or they induce them to look for their indispensable supplies to other islands more liberal in their commercial regulations.

In the mean time, the planters, while they lose a market, ample, constant, profitable, and contiguous, find no indemnification in that of the Northern possessions, whose consumption is comparatively limited, nor in that of the mother country; for there, in addition to the low prices already adverted to, they must encounter the sugar of the Mauritius, which, being now placed on an equality with their own, has increased the amount of its importation, in the course of five years, from four thousand six hundred to a little less, as it is believed, than thirty thousand tons. From this state of things, therefore, serious injury arises to the trade, both of the United States and of the British West India islands. So far as that injury presses upon the latter, it is confidently submitted whether plenary relief can be found, as has been supposed, in the reduction of duties upon their produce, unless it be in a manner to give them a monopoly in the home market equal to that of which they have been deprived in the United States; or even then, unless the reduction be in proportion, not merely to the loss of the market, but to the increased charges incident to the indirect trade for their necessary supplies.

The supply of sugar is already greater than the demand of the home market; and the amount of reduction of duty could not be a clear gain to the planter, because it would be also attended with a partial fall of the price, and his gain could be in proportion to the latter only. This mode of relief, without a correspondent reduction of the bounty allowed to the refiner, would be prejudicial to the revenue, but, with such reduction, much more injurious to the refiner; and if, as it may be well supposed, one-half, at least, of the sugars imported from the West Indies are manufactured for exportation, it is not likely that such mode of relief would, in any event, be beneficial to the planter. It is suggested with great respect and deference, that the more obvious and natural remedy for an evil, which all must admit, would be to remove the cause. This would be done by cheapening the supplies, and extending the market for the productions of the islands, and by authorizing a direct trade with the United States to a degree commensurate with the interests and necessities of the islands, and on such terms as are now allowed, for similar purposes, to all the rest of the world.

The partial application of a like remedy produced a salutary effect from 1825 to 1826, and, therefore, it may well be presumed that a more thorough experiment on both sides, at present, would be still more beneficial. At that time, undoubtedly, the British Northern possessions neither complained nor had cause of complaint; still less can any such cause have arisen since, as their monopoly of the direct trade, instead of relieving, has only aggravated the sufferings of the planters!

It has been stated to the undersigned, however, as the opinion of Great Britain, that, while devising measures for the relief of the West Indies, it is, at the same time, indispensably necessary to consider the claims of the Northern possessions to be protected in the enjoyment of certain accidental advantages. Though the undersigned by no means admits the justice of these claims, he would observe, that, if they are to receive protection, it ought, at least, to be effected in some way not inconsistent with the meditated relief of the planters. This might be done by granting greater facilities for the introduction of the produce of the Northern possessions into the mother country—a measure which would not merely benefit them, but would ensure important advantages to Great Britain, by increasing her revenue, and augmenting and perpetuating the consumption of her manufactures in those possessions.

But the proposition does not go to exclude the productions of the Northern colonies, or even to expose them without protection to a competition with those of the United States. It supposes, on the contrary, that, as far as the former are capable of producing the articles in demand, a fair preference is already secured to them in the West India market by the scale of duties prescribed by the act of 1825, and fully commensurate, consistently with the interests of the planters, with that object. That scale could only prove insufficient if the capacity to produce did not exist, or should depend for its existence upon an exclusive monopoly ruinous to all other interests.

It is not for the undersigned, therefore, to object to that scale of duties as regulated by the act of 1825, though it must be allowed to give the productions of the Northern possessions of Great Britain an equal, or even a better chance in the West India market; but he requires that the United States, as far as they are capable of supplying its wants, may be permitted, in common with the rest of the world, to contribute supplies by a direct trade, and that they may be the carriers of such of their own productions as are indispensable or highly necessary to the planters. That the Northern possessions have an interest in the present state of things, the undersigned does not mean to deny, nor particularly to state. It is sufficient for him to repeat what has been already remarked, that the interests which have grown up in that quarter are adventitious in their character, and subordinate to all the great considerations connected with this subject. They may be of some importance in themselves, and yet there may be views of higher moment and grander scope, to some of which allusion has already been made, before which, in every sense, they ought to give way.

It will be difficult to maintain the propriety of the claim by the Northern possessions, that they should be secured in the enjoyment of a direct trade with all parts of the world, and that it should be denied to other possessions of Great Britain, to whom it is more necessary.

Of the capacity of the British West Indies to supply with their productions all the demands of the Northern colonies, there can be no doubt; yet those colonies, by a direct trade, may introduce similar productions from foreign countries. Why, then, may not the British islands be permitted by the same medium to introduce those articles which the Northern possessions cannot supply, and for which they are dependent upon others? If the Canadian may import from foreign countries, by a direct trade, merchandise of which he is not in need for his own subsistence, and which he may procure from other colonies of Great Britain, why may not the West Indian receive from the United States in the same direct manner that which is indispensably necessary to him, and which none of his Majesty's colonies can supply?

The undersigned does not pretend to state, since he is unable to obtain the information requisite to enable him to state with accuracy, the precise proportion which the productive capacity of the Northern possessions bears to the wants of the West India islands. It is the general opinion that the productions of those possessions, especially corn and other bread stuffs, but little exceed the quantity required for their own consumption; and that the amount of those articles, and even of lumber exported by them to the mother country, the West Indies, and to other parts, is derived principally from the United States, and from some ports of Europe. This opinion would seem to be confirmed by the state of the trade between those possessions and the United States, and by the encouragement given heretofore, and at present, by low duties, to the introduction into their ports from the latter of most, if not all, of the foregoing articles.

The exports from the United States to the British American colonies consist principally of flour, meal, Indian corn, wheat, ship bread, rice, pot and pearl ashes, butter, and lumber; amounting annually, according to the circumstances of the year, to from two and one-half and three and one-half millions of dollars, and little inferior in value to the aggregate exports from the United States to the British West India islands in an open trade.

The Earl of Aberdeen has already inspected the official tables of the exports of domestic articles from the United States during the year 1827; and though, for purposes of comparison, similar tables for 1828 would be more precise, it is believed they would not diminish, if they did not add to the weight of those of 1827. From this statement, and a recurrence to the account already explained, to say nothing of the amount of produce passing down the St. Lawrence, of which, as has been observed, little, if any, account is taken in the United States, the Earl of Aberdeen will perceive that, after a full experiment of the advantages afforded to the British Northern colonies by the present course of trade, they are in fact dependent upon the United States for considerably more than double the amount of their exports to the British West Indies.

By these statements, it appears that, in 1828, the British Northern colonies exported to the British West India islands 45,495 bushels of corn and grain, and, as far as the trade in 1827 may be considered indicative of that of 1828, they received from the United States 88,456 bushels of the same articles; that, of flour and meal, they received from the United States 136,770 barrels, and exported to the West Indies only 36,766; and that a like proportion is observable in the articles of ship bread, and biscuit, and rice. Of lumber, the official tables of the United States are not supposed to afford any satisfactory account; and, in respect to pot and pearl ashes, the British statement is silent; though it will probably be conceded that the supplies of the latter articles are principally from the United States.

On looking to the large amount of importations from the United States by the British Northern colonies, the comparatively small exportation from the latter to the British West Indies cannot escape observation. That these islands require much more than the quantity furnished them by the North, is shown, not only by the table of their direct trade with the United States, but by the amount furnished at present, under all the pressure of the discriminating duties, from the foreign West Indies. It is a matter, in fact, that does not admit of a doubt. That the Northern colonies do not, under these circumstances, send more of the produce received by them from the United States, must be either because a great part of it is absorbed by the demands for the home consumption, or that it is necessary for their export trade with other parts of the world. The first cause satisfactorily evinces the incapacity of those possessions, even under their present advantages, to augment, in any considerable degree, their own productions; the last does not merely evince this, but manifests more strikingly the inexpediency of their claim to a monopoly of the trade with the West Indies, to the exclusion of the United States, upon whose productions they are themselves dependent, not only for their trade with the West Indies, but also for that with the mother country, and with the foreign European ports.

If these facts should be considered as requiring further confirmation, it may be found in the testimony of several of the most intelligent inhabitants of the Northern colonies, taken, in 1826, before the select committee on emigration, by which it appears that, at that period, and previously, Lower Canada did not supply any flour suited to the West India market; and that the whole of the exports of the Upper Province, not exceeding 40,000 barrels, were disposed of in the ports of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, and Halifax, and were insufficient for their wants; that Quebec depended, in a great degree, for provisions, upon the supplies furnished by the United States; and that Canada, at the time, found the utmost difficulty in subsisting her own population. It was further stated in that testimony, that "there was not sufficient corn grown in Upper Canada to induce any foreign market to deal with them; and that it would be extremely desirable, for some years to come, to introduce American flour into the Canadas, in order to make up their deficit for the supply of the West Indies;" that, in fact, their own supply to the West Indian merchant was very inconsiderable, and "that they formed a very secondary consideration in his estimation." One of the persons examined on that occasion, a legislative councillor of Lower Canada, gave it as his opinion, and as one which he thought would be taken for granted, that the provinces of the two Canadas would not be able, from their own produce, to supply a single barrel of flour to the West Indian market for the next twenty years. Without presuming that any of these opinions are in all respects accurate, but making every allowance for the character of such answers, which, if in any degree erroneous, are likely to err in favor of the Canadas, it may be safely and confidently assumed that the Northern possessions do not now, and cannot for a great number of years, however they may be favored and encouraged, produce the requisite supplies for the West Indies. They must rely upon other sources, and principally upon the United States, not merely to furnish the deficiency, but as consumers of the West India produce. To this extent, and for these purposes, the proposition of the undersigned asks for a direct intercourse. The undersigned would here observe, moreover, that the Northern colonies offer as little advantage in their demand for the produce of the British West India islands, as in their capacity to furnish supplies. He is aware of the erroneous supposition that the United States, in their direct trade with the British West Indies heretofore, did not take so much of their produce as of specie, to be invested, as it was imagined, in the produce of other islands. So far, however, as it may be thought to argue an unfavorable course of trade between the United States and those islands, he may confidently rely for its refutation, not only upon its obvious improbability, but upon the past, and even the present course of the trade.

It is obvious that the restrictions by which the trade of the United States with the British West Indies has been so frequently embarrassed, offered peculiar inducements to the importation of specie; but on this head the undersigned may venture to affirm that the amount of specie has not, at any period of the direct trade, exceeded much more than one-fourth of the importation into the United States through those islands.

Without stopping to detect the error of supposing any thing unfavorable to the general result of trade from the exchange of specie for produce, which Lord Aberdeen is aware is a natural occurrence, incident to commerce in all parts of the world, it will be sufficient to observe that, as the advantages of the direct trade to the West India planter were never doubted, it may fairly be inferred that the exchanges were mutually made in the most profitable medium. That specie was occasionally received for part of the supplies furnished by the United States, need not be denied; which would prove, only, that, from the general result of their traffic with other parts, the West India planters were enabled to deal more profitably in specie for the produce of the United States—thus affording additional illustration of the mutual advantage of their intercourse. But the undersigned takes leave wholly to doubt that specie was so taken for the purpose of being invested in similar articles in the foreign islands.

Unless an occasional instance of the kind has been produced by the pressure of those restrictions which it is now proposed to abolish, the occurrence of it would argue in the merchant the unaccountable folly of submitting to a prolonged voyage, but reduced freight, and to the other disadvantages of a circuitous trade, in the search after commodities which lay ready at hand, and which he might convey immediately to his market by a direct voyage, and at a better freight.

It will doubtless, however, occur to Lord Aberdeen, that, whatever may have been the course or nature of the exchanges in a direct trade, they were not merely adapted to the necessities of the parties, but are not likely to be improved under the embarrassments of an indirect trade; or that more produce and less specie would pass off through the circuitous than the direct channel.

Though the Northern colonies may become the carriers, they do not thereby become the consumers, except to a limited extent, of the West India produce. Their capacity to consume in produce the value of all supplies carried by them to the West Indies, or even of that part going from the United States, will not be asserted; and, therefore, it is not perceived how such produce can be received by them, unless from a reliance on the consumption of it in the United States, or other foreign parts. Indeed, in some of the official and other statements furnished by those provinces to the British Government, the advantages of a free transit of American flour through the Northern possessions are argued from the expectation that those districts in the United States which furnish the flour will receive from the Canadians foreign produce in barter! Not to advert to the complete annihilation of such expectation by an interdict of the supply through such a channel, it must be obvious that the United States will not take more produce or less specie under the embarrassments of an indirect intercourse. It is, on the contrary, reasonable to infer that, in such case, for the more bulky articles of West India produce, they would be led to rely, in a still greater degree, upon foreign islands, with augmented facilities; and that they would require specie in return for that portion of their supplies passing through the Northern colonies; thereby increasing rather than diminishing the drain of that article, so far as it may be supposed to be affected by those regulations.

The undersigned would beg leave further to observe, that a refusal of the proposition which he has had the honor to make can have no other obvious pretence than, by means of a monopoly, to give a forced growth to the productions of the Northern possessions, and, in the mean time, to compel the carrying of the produce of the United States and that of the British West Indies through their ports!

The very necessity of a monopoly to effect such a purpose, however, clearly points out the difficulties of production, and the embarrassments of such a course of trade, and shows the losses and distresses to which the planter must be subjected for an indefinite length of time.

It is by no means certain, however, that these objects are consistent with each other, and that the abundant supply of the productions of the United States through the Northern ports would not as effectually discourage the productions of those possessions as the direct trade; and in this way perpetuate the monopoly. Such a result is shown to be more than probable by the foregoing observations, and by the official statements to which they apply. But it is perfectly certain that, if this monopoly should have the intended effect of fostering the growth in Canada of the articles required for the West India market, it would also have the effect of impelling the United States to the cultivation within themselves of the articles for which they have been accustomed to depend upon the West Indies, and consequently of diminishing their demand for those articles. The ability of the North to supply the planter, therefore, would be attended with the loss to the latter of the means of purchasing the supply.

The reasonable duty proposed by the act of 1825, even without the aid of the additional privileges to which the undersigned has heretofore presumed to allude, by gradually and reciprocally developing the resources and the means of consumption of the Northern possessions, by providing a necessary revenue for the planters, and in the interim affording them an advantageous market, would be much more effectual in attaining all rational and desirable ends.

From an impartial view of all the considerations involved in the subject, may not such a course be deemed worthy at least of an experiment? Whether we regard the general deductions of argument, or the series of indisputable facts arising out of the course of trade before and since the order in council of 1826, it can scarcely be denied that the present state of things has, thus far, produced greater injury to the British West Indies than benefit to the British Northern possessions; and that the regulations of the act of 1825 would be extremely beneficial to the planters, if indeed not absolutely remedial of their great distress, will not be questioned. From a recurrence to those regulations, therefore, much positive good is certain to arise; whereas the injury apprehended to others exists only in conjecture, can be ascertained only by experience, and may always be remedied by the protecting measures of Great Britain. It would appear, therefore, to the undersigned, not merely courteous to the United States, but just to the various possessions of Great Britain, to recur to the expedient of trying, under the favorable legislation of both countries, the real utility of the adjustment of 1825.

If the encouragement of the Northern productions be not sufficient in its results to justify the permanent exclusion of those of the United States from the British West India islands, it is equally unreasonable to insist that the latter and the produce of the islands shall be carried circuitously through the Northern ports, at a loss to the producer. The present demand, in addition to the indemnities actually enjoyed by the Northern ports, strips the West India planter of every advantage intended for him by the act of 1825, taking from him not merely the general benefits of a direct trade, but at the same time depriving him of the revenue provided for the support of the local Government. That the productions sent through the Canadas are not cheaper in the West Indies than those going through other ports, is shown by the fact, already made apparent, that a very important part of their supply is carried in the latter way, and especially through the Danish islands; but, as no duty is collected on that coming from the British possessions, the planter, on his paying the same price as for that charged with a duty, must, in addition, make up, by some other means, the loss to his revenue.

It is at such sacrifices of public considerations, and of important interests of Great Britain herself, that the present claim is made, of forcing the trade of the United States with the British West India islands through the British Northern possessions.

The undersigned might here ask the question, whether advantages like these now claimed, uncertain and contingent as they must necessarily be, deserved to be cherished at the risk which must eventually attend them? Are they of sufficient magnitude to justify the encouragement of a spirit of jealousy between two neighboring nations, whose prosperity, it is admitted, would be best promoted by mutual good will, or the sowing in the population of these Northern possessions the seeds of commercial hostility, which may produce roots of bitterness difficult to be eradicated?

The undersigned, however, hopes to be excused for asking Lord Aberdeen to consider whether this claim be not as difficult of attainment in fact, as it is of justification in reason.

That the United States may be prevented from enjoying a direct trade with the British West India islands, is not to be questioned; but it does not follow that they can be compelled to carry on the indirect trade through the British Northern possessions in preference to the other ports, and in opposition to the interest and inclinations of the American people. To ensure a continuance of such a constrained state of things, would require a far greater degree of favor than Great Britain gives to those possessions at present, or could give at any time, without effecting the ruin of her West India planters.

The present course of trade through those colonies, in fact, owes its existence, in a great measure, to the toleration and forbearance of the United States. They have submitted to it for the moment, in the expectation that the regulations of the order of 1826 were merely temporary, and would yield, in due time, to a liberal regard to the general interests of commerce. But when Great Britain shall avow the intention permanently to exclude the United States from the direct trade with her West India islands, and to compel the interchange of their products to pass through her Northern possessions, for the purpose of creating or sustaining rival interests in that quarter, it will then be for the United States to decide whether their indirect trade may not be more profitably conducted through other channels.

So entirely dependent are the Northern possessions upon the will of the United States for the advantages which they now enjoy, that a simple repeal of the restrictions alluded to in the proposition which the undersigned had the honor to submit, if the United States could be supposed so entirely unmindful of their navigation interests and enterprise, as to make it, without any act on the part of Great Britain, would effectually destroy their monopoly. And, moreover, if it should be deemed necessary or proper to aim measures at these provinces alone, the permission of a direct trade from the ports of the United States to the British islands, in British vessels, other than those owned in the Northern ports, would not only break up the existing trade in that direction, but would forever blight even the imaginary prospects of future production.

The advantages to the United States, however, of employing their own navigation in a part, at least, of the trade—of enlarging and conciliating their interests in the colonies of France, Spain, Sweden, and Denmark, and, by reciprocal accommodations, of gradually increasing the market in those parts, both for demand and supply, would powerfully, if not irresistibly, tempt their trade into those channels. Indeed, the official returns heretofore explained, sufficiently show that it has, in fact, been already invited thither, in a considerable degree, by advantages which it would not be difficult to augment, until the commodities could be introduced as cheap as those of Great Britain, unless the latter should be protected by a higher scale of duties than was contemplated by the act of 1823, and one beyond the ability of the planters to endure.

The Earl of Aberdeen will do the undersigned the justice to believe that, in discussing the contingent policy of the two countries in the arrangement of their commercial enterprise, he holds forth no apprehended event with a view to intimidate, or through a desire that it may take place. He will also perceive that the measures last alluded to would not necessarily imply, on the part of the United States, either resentment or retaliation; but would be resorted to as the system of commercial regulation calculated, under the circumstances of the case, to give the best direction to an important branch of their enterprise.

To such extent they would be altogether practicable, and might be supposed indispensably necessary. They might, indeed, from the natural tendency of such measures, and the peculiar influence of events, and in the total loss of the trade between the United States and the British Northern possessions.

In such a view of the subject, though the undersigned will not here undertake to pronounce upon the value of the trade in question, he would suggest that it may be worthy the consideration of those who claim the advantages of monopoly rather than of fair competition, whether the loss of it, with the chance of contesting with the foreign islands for the trade with the West Indies, be preferable to a reasonable enjoyment of both.

That the United States possess the means of effectually controlling their trade through and with the British Northern colonies, the undersigned is fully confident.

He is aware, however, that a contrary idea has been entertained by some, who may have regarded the subject in a narrow or interested point of view.

In adverting to this topic, the undersigned will not permit himself to suppose that the possibility of evading the revenue laws of the United States, and of producing a course of contraband trade, in violation of their legitimate regulations, can for a moment enter into the calculations of this Government, or receive the remotest degree of encouragement or countenance from its measures and policy.

If no other motive opposed the adoption of such an alternative, Great Britain would find a sufficient one in the certainty that, however, for the moment, it might minister to the jealousy, or appear to favor the interests, of her subjects in the colonies, it would eventually produce the most baneful effects upon their morals and their habits. Thus corrupted, the skill and hardihood acquired in evading and transgressing the laws of a neighboring country, would afterwards be practised against those of their own Government.

But, in addition to the general disfavor with which any expectation of benefit from a contraband trade should be met, Lord Aberdeen may be assured that it would not be difficult for the United States to prevent such a trade altogether. A more efficient cordon of police, and a greater degree of vigilance, might be requisite than in ordinary times; but the fidelity of the American custom-house officers has been thoroughly proved, and their exertions, even upon this frontier, have in general been adequate to all substantial purposes. Such was the case even when they were called upon to enforce the embargo and non-intercourse laws, when they received but little sympathy or encouragement from the moral sense of the community. The fact is, however, too clear to require argument, that the amount of trade to be carried on by smuggling, however successful, would be inconsiderable in comparison with the extent and profits of a legal and regular intercourse, and, therefore, is entitled to but little weight, even when regarded with a view to pecuniary results. Lord Aberdeen will not require to be reminded, that, to prevent illicit trade, it is chiefly necessary to remove the temptation of high prices, or to create a risk greater than the reward to be gained by successful fraud. Nothing could be more easy than this, in respect to the mode of intercourse now under consideration.

The interposition of the custom-house officer would scarcely be requisite to prevent the introduction of West India produce into the United States through the Northern colonies. Arrangements could readily be made with the Powers to which the foreign islands belong, to furnish the requisite supplies of West India produce from those islands, on cheap terms, and in steady and abundant quantities. These arrangements would of themselves forbid competition. But whilst American flour can be carried to the British West Indies as cheap from the United States through the foreign islands as through the Northern possessions, though subject to the discriminating duty, in favor of the latter, of five shillings per barrel, it will not be supposed that the bulky articles of sugar, rum, and molasses, without such aid, can be tempted through the Northern possessions by the risk of detection, and the penalties of the law.

The undersigned does not believe that the temptations and facilities for the introduction into the Northern colonies of flour and other articles from the United States, are materially greater.

So far as the trade with the British West Indies can operate as an inducement, it has been seen already that American produce is carried thither as cheap through the foreign islands as the Northern ports. The supply of American flour in the Northern colonies is believed to be principally furnished by the Genesee country, and the country bordering upon Lake Erie; and it stands admitted in the evidence upon the archives of the House of Commons, that, for flour, the market at New York is generally better than the market at Montreal and Quebec. Indeed, so important is the operation of these facts, that the most intelligent merchants suppose that so much of the American trade with the British West Indies, as passes through the Northern colonies instead of the foreign islands, is chiefly diverted thither by the greater facilities of procuring in those ports an assorted cargo suitable to the West India market.

In the testimony afforded by the inhabitants of Lower Canada to the committee of the House of Commons in 1826, it was asserted, and remained uncontradicted, that, "against the superintendence of the British custom-house officers, it would be impossible to smuggle any part of a cargo, or even a barrel of flour, into the province of Lower Canada." On this ground they were enabled to encourage the introduction of American flour, in proportion to the amount of their exports to the West Indies and other places, without danger of its being brought into the home consumption; and the encouragement then given shows the importance attached by his Majesty's Government to that evidence. On this supposition, Lord Aberdeen will readily acknowledge the facility with which the United States, through means of a custom-house police, strengthened and extended according to their means, may accomplish the same ends; more especially as the readier interdiction of the return trade from Canada into the United States, by diminishing the means of payment, would also diminish the motives to incur the risk and penalties incident to a prohibited trade. The undersigned is apprehensive that he has already dwelt longer upon these considerations than is necessary, after so much personal explanation as he has heretofore had the honor of yielding, and will content himself, as to any further arguments that might be offered, with referring to the various other suggestions which have been made by him in the course of this negotiation. He cannot, however, entirely dismiss the subject, without repeating, for the last time, his deep solicitude for the result, and without most earnestly recalling the attention of his Majesty's ministers to the state in which the relations between the two countries would be left should this point be unfavorably decided. In such case, the Government of the United States, while disappointed in its cherished hopes of an arrangement by mutual and reasonable concessions, would find nothing conciliating in the retrospect of a long course of fruitless negotiation, and nothing cheering in the future prospect, darkened, as it would be, by the possibility of a recurrence, by the two nations, to that system of countervailing measures that has already proved so detrimental to their harmony and welfare.

The undersigned takes this occasion to renew to Lord Aberdeen the assurance of his highest respect and consideration.

LOUIS McLANE.

To the Rt. Hon. the Earl of ABERDEEN, &c.

Extract of a letter from Mr. McLane to Mr. Van Buren, dated LONDON, April 6, 1830.

Sir: I have had a conference with Lord Aberdeen to-day, which I sought for the purpose of urging the definitive answer to my proposition relative to the colonial trade. In my previous conference, he gave me some reason to expect that it would be given in time for this packet, but I regret to say that this expectation has not been realized. He assures me that the delay has been wholly unavoidable, and that it proceeds from no indisposition to obviate the difficulties, if that be practicable, which lie in the way of a satisfactory adjustment of the question.

I have not failed to represent to him the very serious injury and embarrassment which must result from delaying the answer until the Congress shall rise, and of what I fear may be the insuperable difficulties of any prospective legislation with a view to a future arrangement. None of these efforts have yet proved sufficient to bring the answer.

Under these circumstances, unless Congress shall continue in session until the arrival of the packet of the 16th instant, which I hope they will do, it will not be possible to get the decision in time to be submitted to that body. Deeply as I lament this state of things, I need scarcely say that it has not been possible for me, by any exertion, to avoid it.

In this stage of the business it may be proper for me to remark, that the negotiation must end in one of three modes; in a positive refusal to change the present regulations, or a revocation of the order in council of 1826, upon the terms of my proposition, or in a revocation of that order, with some increase of the duties imposed by the act of Parliament of 1825, in favor of the productions of the Northern possessions.

Looking as well to the progress of the negotiation as to the obstinate and persevering opposition, by the interests in those Northern possessions, to any change whatever, and to the influence which it is obvious they exercise here, I confess that the last mode appears to me the most probable. I do not believe that any legislation by Congress, with a view to that state of things, and vesting in the President a discretion to regulate the trade or rescind our laws in either of these contingencies, would in any manner prove prejudicial.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Van Buren to Mr. McLane, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, June 18, 1830.

SIR: Herewith you will receive a copy of the confidential message which was sent by the President to the two Houses of Congress, during its late session, in pursuance of your suggestion, that the measure recommended by it might be made useful in your negotiations with the British Government, together with a copy of the law which was the result of that message.

It is confidently hoped that the law referred to, with the motives in which it originated, and which secured it a rapid passage through the two Houses of Congress, without material opposition from any quarter whatever, added to the frank and liberal offer and explanations already made to the British Government on the part of the Executive Department of this, will, of themselves, be regarded by that Government as affording sufficient ground for its changing the position which it occupied in regard to the subject of its colonial trade, in all its bearings, so far as it affected the United States, at the period of the accession to power of the present ministry, and for the adoption of a course of policy which may lead to the speedy and mutually advantageous revival of trade between the United States and the West India possessions of Great Britain, if, indeed, that important concern should not have been already satisfactorily adjusted. It ought to be regarded, likewise, as a direct conciliatory step on the part of this Government, of the highest character, as emanating from its executive and legislative authorities combined, and as a solemn public movement on our part towards a friendly accommodation with the British Government, upon terms of a fair and just reciprocity.

You will have been made acquainted, in the instructions which have been heretofore given you, with the opinion of the President as to the course which would most probably be pursued by the United States if Great Britain should think proper to insist, as a preliminary measure, upon the unconditional repeal of our laws, or should be so selfish as to desire to engross for its navigation the whole of the carrying trade between this country and its West India colonial possessions. But that your negotiation may continue to be characterized by that spirit of frankness which it has hitherto been a leading object on our part to infuse into it, I am directed explicitly to state, upon this occasion, that the President will consider it his duty, in case that negotiation should eventuate unfavorably upon this point, to recommend to Congress an extension of the interdict now existing as to the West India possessions of Great Britain, to those which she holds in the Northern parts of this continent, and the adoption of proper measures for enforcing its rigid observance, as a course which would, in his judgment, best comport, in such an event, with the interests of the United States, and correspond with the respect which is due to the character and past conduct of this Government. It is not for him, however, to anticipate with certainty the effect of such suggestions upon the national councils of the Union, though it is not to be supposed that, in such a case, any thing will be omitted on their part to vindicate the honor and maintain the interests of this Government.

Mr. McLane to the Earl of Aberdeen.

9, CHANDOS STREET, PORTLAND PLACE,
July 12, 1830.

The Rt. Hon. the Earl of Aberdeen, &c.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has had the honor already, in a personal conference, to explain to the Earl of Aberdeen, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, certain measures adopted by the Congress of the United States, during their late session, which have an immediate and important bearing on the relations of the two countries, and upon the proposition heretofore submitted by the undersigned respecting the West India trade. Having received from the Earl of Aberdeen an intimation of the propriety of communicating those measures in a more formal manner, the undersigned has the honor herewith to transmit such information on the subject as he is now in possession of.

The first of the measures alluded to is an act of the Congress of the United States, authorizing the President, in the recess of Congress, to annul all the restrictive and discriminating measures of the United States, and to open the ports to British vessels trading with the British West Indies, in the manner particularly pointed out in the act; a copy of which, for the better explanation of the case, the undersigned begs leave to subjoin.

The undersigned has the honor also to inform Lord Aberdeen, that, during the late session of the Congress of the United States, several other laws were passed, by which, in lieu of the duties imposed upon certain articles of the produce of the West India islands, and of the possessions of Great Britain, by previous regulations, the following duties only are to be collected, that is to say: Upon molasses, a duty of five cents, instead of ten cents, per gallon, allowing at the same time a drawback of the duty upon all rum which may be manufactured from that article, and exported from the United States;

On salt, a duty of ten, instead of twenty, cents per bushel;

On cocoa, a duty of one cent per pound on all imported after the 31st of December, 1830, or remaining at that time in the custom-house stores under the bond of the importer;

And on coffee, a duty of two, instead of five, cents per pound, from and after the 31st of December, 1830; and of one cent per pound from and after the 31st day of December, 1831; and the same duties to be taken on coffee remaining at the respective times under bond in the custom-house stores.

The undersigned will not permit himself to doubt, that, in the first of these acts, emanating from the frank and friendly spirit which the President has uniformly professed, and passed with an avowed reference to the pending negotiation, the Earl of Aberdeen will see new and irresistible motives for concurring in the promotion of the end to which this measure directly leads.

Such a measure could not have been recommended by the President without incurring a deep responsibility to-

It is a voluntary and leading step in the conciliating policy of the two nations, taken in disdain of the restraints of form, and which, if met in a corresponding spirit, cannot fail to produce that friendly intercourse and real harmony so ardently desired by those who consult the true interests and glory of both countries. It concedes in its terms all the power in the regulation of the colonial trade, and authorizes the President to confer on British vessels all those privileges, as well in the circuitous as the direct voyage, which Great Britain has at any time demanded or desired. It has done this in the only manner in which it was possible for Congress, at the present moment, and under existing circumstances, to act, without a total abandonment of even those advantages conceded by the present regulations of Great Britain, and without raising up new interests to oppose or obstruct the favorable disposition expressed by this Government. Nor will the undersigned conceal his hope and belief that this act will stamp the negotiation with a new and more favorable character; and that the United States having thus taken the first step, and particularly defined the terms of their legislation, the mode of adjustment may be disencumbered of even those objections with which it was supposed to be embarrassed when submitted to Lord Dudley, and by the answer which on that occasion was given to Mr. Gallatin. The objections suggested at that period on the part of Great Britain had no special or exclusive reference to the measure in question, but to the giving of any prospective pledge by which she might commit herself to the adoption of any specific line of conduct contingent on events which could not be foreseen, and to the entering into any informal agreement as to mutual acts of legislation, while it was impossible to anticipate the details with which those acts might be accompanied, or the position and circumstances in which the two countries, and the commercial commonwealth generally, might be placed at the time when the laws enacted should come into effect. If these objections could at any time have been essential to the subject, which the undersigned by no means admits, they certainly are not so at present.

The act of Congress has been passed without any pledge, prospective or otherwise; it, therefore, relieves the adjustment of this subject from that part of the difficulty. The details of the colonial legislation on the part of the United States are precisely defined and fully explained by the law. Frankly announcing all this, it leaves to Great Britain herself the selection of the mode and time in which, according to her conception of her own interests, she may restore the direct trade between the United States and the West Indies. She is enabled deliberately to do this with a full knowledge of the before mentioned details, and of the precise position and circumstances, as well of the two nations as of the commercial commonwealth in general, at the time when the measures are to come into effect. This she may do without any risk as to the future, and with the certainty that, while doing an act of justice to a friendly Power, and relieving it from an invidious exclusion from advantages allowed to all other nations, she is contributing materially to the prosperity of her possessions in the West Indies.

The undersigned will not dismiss this subject without expressing the hope and persuasion that, in the other measures of Congress alluded to, the Earl of Aberdeen will find not merely all the considerations heretofore urged for giving new facilities to the trade between the United States and the British West Indies materially strengthened, if not absolutely confirmed, but that a further and more favorable alteration is thereby made in the object and character of the negotiation.

These measures manifest at least a laudable desire to loose the shackles of trade and commerce, which, if England is so disposed, she cannot better encourage than by a relaxation of her own restraints upon the particular branch of trade under discussion.

The Earl of Aberdeen has been already informed that the consumption of foreign molasses in the United States is not less than thirteen millions of gallons, even under the discouragement of the high rate of duty and a denial of the drawback, which nearly proved fatal to the chief source of consumption—the distilleries of New England. It is obvious, however, that the reduction of the duty to its present low rate, and the allowance of the drawback, must swell the demand for this article even beyond the ordinary amount, which, in the regular course of a direct trade, would seek its principal supply in the British West Indies.

Of coffee, not less thirty-seven millions of pounds were annually imported into the United States; and of those in a regular trade, not less than eight millions from the British West Indies.

Of four hundred thousand pounds of cocoa annually imported into the United States, little less than one-fourth was brought from the British West Indies.

The Earl of Aberdeen will readily perceive that the reduction of duty on these articles, and especially on coffee, to a rate which will soon be little more than nominal, cannot fail to at least double the importation.

These remarks apply with even additional force to the article of salt, the consumption of which is more dependent on the rate of duty than that of any other necessary of life.

The enormous quantity of this article requisite to supply the wants of twelve millions of people is too obvious to need any conjectural assertion; but it is worthy of observation that, notwithstanding the extent of the home supply encouraged by the high duty of twenty cents per bushel, the annual importation of that article from abroad seldom amounted to less than five millions of bushels. Of this amount more than three millions came from Great Britain and her possessions, her West India islands furnishing at least one million.

To what extent this amount may be enlarged by the increased consumption arising from the low rate of duty and the advantages of an easy trade, the Earl of Aberdeen may readily conjecture.

It should be remarked, also, that, while the consumption of this article is thus augmented, the diminution of the duty must proportionably diminish the price of salted provisions. So far as these, therefore, form part of the supplies to the West Indies, the subsistence of the islands will be cheapened, while the demand for their produce is increased.

It should not escape the attention of the Earl of Aberdeen that the provisions of these acts of the Congress, so far as they relate to cocoa, coffee, and salt, confer encouragement on the trade of the West Indies with the United States, which did not exist, and could not have been contemplated at the period of passing the act of Parliament of 1825. They, therefore, superadd new and important motives for restoring the trade then offered, and for restoring it upon terms not less favorable.

While the participation of the British islands is invited in the advantages to be derived from this enlarged and increasing demand of the United States for the produce of the West Indies, the undersigned takes leave to suggest the expediency of securing that participation before the trade may be exclusively diverted into other channels by the superior advantages of a direct intercourse with other islands.

In closing this communication to the Earl of Aberdeen, the undersigned will take the occasion to repeat his deep interest in the subject, and a renewed hope of an early and favorable issue. The Earl of Aberdeen will not fail to appreciate the spirit and motive by which the President was actuated in recommending, and the Congress in passing, the act to which allusion was first made. The effects of delay upon the commercial enterprise of the United States, and the disappointment of interests desirous of a different measure of legislation, though they offered great embarrassments, were not the greatest difficulties attendant upon that act. To give to Great Britain the fullest time to consult her own interest and convenience; to make a further and a signal effort to place the commercial relations of the two countries upon a footing of sure and lasting harmony; and to guard, in a manner consistently with duty, against delay during the recess of Congress, could only be done by a measure calculated also to awaken at once the spirit of commercial speculation, and to create new expectations of favorable dispositions on the part of this Government.

If, as the undersigned will continue to hope, the British Government should find it their interest to realize these expectations, their measures will derive additional grace from the frankness and promptitude with which they may be adopted; and if, unfortunately, these hopes are destined to experience a disappointment, it is not less the duty of his Majesty's Government to quiet the public expectations thus excited, and to mitigate, as far as may be in its power, the injurious effects thereof, by giving an early reply to the application which, in behalf of his Government, the undersigned has had the honor to submit.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Lord Aberdeen the assurances of his highest consideration.

LOUIS McLANE.

Mr. McLane to Mr. Van Buren.

LONDON, August 20, 1830.

SIR: I have the satisfaction to forward herewith a letter from the Earl of Aberdeen, dated the 17th instant, by which it will be perceived that my negotiation for the colonial trade is successfully closed; and that this Government consents to restore to us the direct intercourse with her American colonies, upon the terms of the proposition submitted by me on the 12th of December last.

It will be perceived, also, that, from an apprehension that the late act of Congress might admit of an interpretation incompatible with the terms of my proposition, and the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825, the British Government have accompanied their consent with an explanation of the construction which, in their opinion, the law ought to receive, and to which their proceedings will be conformed. This is precautionary, however, and intended to guard against misapprehension in future. The proclamation of the President, which is authorized upon evidence satisfactory to himself, will be immediately followed, upon the part of Great Britain, by the revocation of the order in council of July, 1827, the abolition of the discriminating duties on American vessels in British colonial ports, and by extending to the vessels of the United States the advantages of the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825.

If it had been admitted that the late act of Congress varied intentionally from the terms of our proposition, and the British act of the 5th July, 1825, and demanded advantages not contemplated by the latter, it would have been considered as reviving pretensions already given up, and must have had the effect of entirely defeating any hope of recovering the colonial trade. Recurring to your letter of the 18th June last, communicating the President's message to Congress, and a copy of the law, I did not doubt that the act was, in fact, intended to authorize the President to give effect, in the recess of Congress, to the known and uniform object of the negotiation, and to accept a renewal of the trade upon the terms of the proposition which I had been authorized to make. I felt it my duty, therefore, to concur in the suggestion, that the supposed deviations in the law from the act of the 5th July, 1825, were apparent merely, and neither intentional, nor for the purpose of advancing any new claim upon the part of our Government.

My instructions authorized me to propose that the United States should now comply with the conditions of the act of 5th July, 1825, by repealing our restrictive laws, "if such a measure would lead to the revocation of the order in council of July, 1827, to the abolition or suspension of all discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonial ports, and to the enjoyment by us of the advantages of the last mentioned act of Parliament."

These instructions were literally pursued in the proposition which I submitted in December last, and, together with it, were communicated to Congress. But it will be apparent to you that, if the law necessarily authorize a different construction than that adopted by this Government, it will not be a compliance with the conditions of the act of Parliament, but demand advantages which, by that act, are expressly denied, and by this Government allowed to no other country.

The navigation act of Great Britain, by which all her previous acts upon that subject are repealed, and her system permanently established, passed simultaneously with the act of the 5th July, 1825, regulating the trade of the British possessions abroad; and by that act the importation, both into her European and colonial ports, is restricted to the vessels of the country of which the articles imported shall be the produce. Nor has this restriction been considered inconsistent with our commercial convention with Great Britain, which we have anxiously sought to extend to the colonial intercourse. The beforementioned act of the 5th July, 1825, regulating the trade with the British possessions abroad, refers, in express terms, to the act concerning navigation, and limits the right of importation into the British colonial ports to American produce, and to vessels coming directly from the ports of the United States. By acceding to the terms of our proposition, therefore, Great Britain extends to our vessels all the advantages of the act of 5th July, 1825. She moreover places the United States, in the intercourse with the colonies, on the same footing with all other nations; and by assenting to regulations, though by legislative enactment, in the colonial trade, similar to those provided by our commercial convention for the intercourse between the United States and the British possessions in Europe, she now concedes to us, in this respect, substantially that which we have been ineffectually seeking since the year 1815.

I am not aware that the restriction of the right of importation into the colonies to articles of American produce, was at any period seriously objected to by our Government. Nor can the difference, in this respect, between American and British vessels, if we allow it to continue, be an object of much importance in any point of view. It will generally be our interest, as it is that of every other nation, to allow the exportation of its surplus foreign produce in the vessels of any other country. It must be observed, also, that this is a privilege resulting from the general spirit of our laws, and therefore resting in our discretion. There is nothing in the arrangement now proposed to prevent the United States from hereafter denying to British vessels this advantage, if it prove injurious to their commerce, and in placing by that means the vessels of both countries, in this respect, upon an equal footing. I ought to observe, however, that sound policy would not warrant such a measure at any time.

Independently of these considerations, it is certain that both the restrictions now reserved by the construction adopted by this Government were absolutely conceded by ours before the present negotiation commenced, and could not have been renewed at present with any hope of success. More than has been secured by the present labors, the concessions of the last administration precluded us from demanding. But if this had not been so, more could not have been obtained.

In the letter of Mr. Gallatin to Mr. Clay of the 27th of October, 1826, the meaning of the British act of Parliament of 5th July, 1825, which does not appear to have been previously understood by our Government, is fully and intelligibly explained. To ascertain the precise state of the regulations at that period, and the extent of the conditions and restrictions prescribed by the famous act of July, 1825, Mr. Gallatin reviewed all the British statutes upon this subject, and superadded the following observations.

"From what precedes, it follows, first, that the restriction which limits the importations in foreign vessels of goods into the British West Indies and American colonies, to vessels of the country of which the goods are the produce, and coming direct from such country, having been revived by the navigation act of the 5th of July, 1825, is still in force; secondly, that the restriction which limited the exportations in foreign vessels of goods exported from the British West Indies and American colonies to a direct exportation to the country to which such vessel did belong, is so far repealed as that such exportations in such vessels may be made to any country whatever, Great Britain and its dependencies excepted."

"Although there is no prospect that any arrangement will shortly take place on that subject, yet it is desirable to be prepared for any contingency. And I wish that the President would take into consideration whether, supposing an arrangement, either by convention or by mutual modification on both sides of existing laws or regulations, to be practicable, it would be proper, so far as relates to navigation, to agree to the terms contained in the acts of Parliament."

"The most important of the restrictions on the direct or circuitous trade, that which limited the exportation from the British West Indies in American vessels to the United States, has been repealed; and there remain but two—such exportations cannot be made in American vessels to Great Britain or her dependencies, a point on which we cannot insist, and which is already given up by the instructions; and the importations into those colonies of American produce, must, if made in American vessels, be direct from the United States. Is it necessary, on that account, to insist on the right of preventing British vessels, other than those coming direct from the colonies, from clearing from the United States for those colonies? Or, in other words, (for it is clear that with such restriction no arrangement is practicable,) is it worth while, on that account, to continue to cut off altogether the intercourse between the United States and the British colonies? On that question I beg leave to submit two observations: First. The right of importing produce of the United States into British West Indies from other places than the United States, is in itself of no great value. It might occasionally be convenient, when the market of Cuba or of other ports in the Gulf of Mexico was glutted with American produce, to have a right to take it in American vessels to the British West India ports; but it is but rarely that these will not, from the same causes, be also glutted at the same time, and that the expense of a double voyage and freight could be incurred. Secondly. Whilst contending for a nominal reciprocity, we must acknowledge that the other party must consider how far this reciprocity will be real. It is now ascertained that four-fifths of the tonnage employed in our intercourse with Great Britain herself are American, and only one-fifth British. Considering the species of population, the climate, and commercial capital of the West Indies, and the distance of Great Britain, it is utterly impossible that the direct intercourse between the United States and the British West Indies should not, with equal duties and charges, be carried on in a still greater proportion in vessels of the United States. The only compensation, in that respect, to Great Britain, is to be found in the circuitous voyages which British vessels may make from that country through the United States and her West India colonies; and I feel quite confident—I think any man acquainted with the subject will be of the same opinion—that even granting them that privilege, will leave more than three-fourths of the intercourse to our vessels!!”

“It will not escape you that the intercourse by sea between the United States and the British West Indies and North American colonies has already been considered as necessarily connected together by the British Government, and that this connexion has been kept up in the acts of Parliament, in the articles proposed to Mr. Rush, and indeed in all former proposals on their part.”

In consequence, as it may be supposed, of this explanation and advice from Mr. Gallatin, our Government thenceforward abandoned whatever pretensions they may have previously set up beyond the acts of Parliament. In a letter from Mr. Clay, dated the 11th April, 1827, containing further instructions to Mr. Gallatin, he was informed “that the President is willing to recommend to Congress, at its next session, first, to suspend the alien duties on British vessels and cargoes, and allow their entry into our ports with the same kind of British or British colonial produce as may be imported in American vessels, the vessels of both countries paying the same charges; and, secondly, to abolish the restriction in the act of 1823 to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British colonies, leaving Great Britain in the exclusive possession of the circuitous trade between Great Britain proper, through her colonies, and the United States. Mr. Gallatin will inquire whether the passage of an act of Congress to that effect would lead to the revocation of the British order in council of July, 1827, to the abolition of the discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonial ports, and to the enjoyment by our vessels of the advantages offered by the act of the 5th of July, 1825.”

These propositions were communicated by Mr. Gallatin to the British Government, in a note to Lord Dudley, of the 17th of August, 1827, in which he remarks that “this mode would repeal all former acts of the American Government which had been objected to by Great Britain, fulfil the condition in the act of Parliament as now understood, and remove every obstacle in the way to an arrangement; but that it would be useless for the President to make such recommendation without first ascertaining the intentions of the British Government;” and he therefore inquired “whether, upon the passage of such an act as the President proposes to recommend, the British Government would allow to American vessels the privileges of trade and intercourse according to the act of the 5th of July, 1825.” With these communications, it will be seen that my instructions, and the overture by me submitted on the 12th of December last, and now assented to by Great Britain, are entirely coincident.

I have been thus minute, that the precise and uniform object of our negotiation with this Government should not be mistaken; and that the President, clearly and explicitly understanding these, may feel no hesitation, when executing the law, to interpret each particular clause in conformity with the obvious scope and design of the act.

Less difficulty, if possible, than on these points, can exist in regard to the entry of British vessels and their cargoes in the ports of the United States, from the islands, provinces, or colonies, designated in the second section of the act. According to Mr. Gallatin's despatch, “the intercourse by sea between the United States and the British West Indies and North American colonies has already been considered as necessarily connected together by the British Government, and that this connexion has been kept up in all the acts of Parliament.” It will not, therefore, be now separated. The general terms employed in this section are sufficiently comprehensive to embrace any description of entry; and in his instructions to the several collectors, the President may properly direct an entry similar to that specified in the first section of the bill, and in the spirit of our proposition.

Such, I presume, was the purpose of the law. I have, however, suggested to this Government, in answer to the difficulty felt upon this point, the possibility that these general terms may have proceeded from an apprehension of the existing discriminating duty of one dollar per ton on American vessels in these Northern colonial ports. Should such be the case, it will not escape you that this duty is prescribed by the order of the King in council, in 1823, in retaliation of our law of that year; and that, by the terms of my proposition, it will be now abolished.

If the remaining words of apparent difficulty constitute a provision inconsistent with our proposition and the act of 5th July, 1825, I am obliged to confess myself incapable of comprehending either their object or meaning. I refer, of course, to the following clause: “Leaving the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions or possessions on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it now is.”

Such a provision, or any thing resembling it, is now introduced for the first time into our legislation upon this subject. With all other parts of the British dominions, our commercial intercourse is regulated either by the convention with Great Britain, or, with the exception of the ports in the Northern provinces, absolutely prohibited by acts of Parliament. No legislation on either side can affect the stipulations of the convention, and any relaxation of existing prohibitions must be beneficial.

This clause, as it stands, if it be not altogether nugatory and out of place, would seem rather to apprehend some evil, not understood or explained, from advantages to be conferred on our trade by Great Britain. In any view of the subject, however, it can properly relate only to the footing on which our commercial intercourse with other ports will be left at the time of conceding such advantages. Happily, therefore, with whatever object the clause may have been introduced, the President may issue his proclamation with every assurance that the correspondent acts on the part of this Government will leave “the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it now is.”

That you may have all the British acts of Parliament relative to this subject before you, and compare without difficulty the various provisions of the act of the 5th of July, 1825, for the encouragement of British shipping and navigation, and of that of the same date regulating the trade with the British possessions abroad, I have the honor herewith to forward you “Hume's Custom Laws,” containing all that may be useful in your researches.

The observations of the Earl of Aberdeen relative to the scale of duties in favor of those interests incidentally fostered by the suspension of the intercourse between the United States and the West Indies, are less unfavorable than, at the date of my despatch of the 6th of April, I had reason to apprehend. It was on the ground of this apprehension, principally, that, in my note to Lord Aberdeen of the 12th of July last, I alluded so particularly to the acts of Congress reducing the duty on several articles of West India produce.

Though it may be probable that the schedule of duties adopted contemporaneously with the act of Parliament of the 5th of July, 1825, will be hereafter modified, the effect must be more severely felt by the West India planter, already overburdened, than by our merchants; and in this there is a safe guaranty against any excessive alteration. There is good reason to believe, moreover, that such modification, whenever it shall be made, will consist in reducing the duty on some important articles, while it may increase it on others; and that our trade, in the aggregate, will not be materially affected. This modification, however, is not a part or condition of the present arrangement, and will therefore depend upon future contingencies, of which each nation will be free to take advantage; and ours, particularly, to resort to countervailing duties, if that course be deemed expedient. On this question, we will always have the West Indian interest on our side; and that, after the concessions heretofore made, is all we can expect. The arrangement now proposed will restore to our vessels the direct trade with the British colonial ports, and place the navigation of both countries in that trade upon an equal footing. We may safely rely upon the skill and enterprise of the American merchants to accomplish the rest.

I need scarcely refer to the period for which this question has embarrassed the trade of our citizens and the relations of the two countries, nor to the numerous failures which have attended the efforts of our Government to adjust it. But it ought not to be forgotten that, in producing these failures, technical interpretations and misapprehension of legal provisions have had their full share. Sensible of this, I felt it my duty to guard, if possible, against their recurrence; and after the solicitude and perseverance with which I have conducted the negotiation, I could not shun the responsibility of attempting to reconcile the apparent obscurities of the law with the clear and frank object of our Government. I am happy to believe, moreover, that, in the attempt, I am fully sustained by the soundest principles of construction. In any event, I shall feel conscious that, with the sincerest desire to conform to the instructions, and sustain the character of the Executive, I have faithfully contributed to succor the enterprise of my fellow-citizens, and to place the foreign relations of the country upon a foundation of lasting harmony.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LOUIS McLANE.

To the HON. MARTIN VAN BUREN,
Secretary of State, Washington.

The Earl of Aberdeen to Mr. McLane.

FOREIGN OFFICE, August 17, 1830.

The undersigned, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Mr. McLane, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America to this court, dated the 12th ultimo, communicating certain measures which have been adopted by Congress with a view to remove the obstacles which have hitherto impeded the re-establishment of the commercial intercourse between the United States and the British West India colonies.

Previously to the receipt of this communication, his Majesty's Government had already had under their consideration Mr. McLane's note of the 16th March last, explanatory of the proposition contained in his letter of the 12th of December, 1829, with reference to the same subject; and the undersigned assures Mr. McLane that his Majesty's Government, in the earnest and dispassionate attention which they bestowed upon this proposition, were actuated by the most friendly feelings towards the Government of the United States, and by a sincere disposition to meet the proposals which he was authorized to make, in the spirit with which they were offered.

But the undersigned considers it unnecessary now to enter into any detailed discussion of the points embraced in those previous communications of Mr. McLane, because they are in a great measure superseded by the more specific, and therefore more satisfactory, propositions contained in his note of the 12th ultimo; to the contents of which note, therefore, the undersigned will principally confine his present observations.

Of the character and effect of the recent measure of the American Congress, Mr. McLane observes, that "it concedes, in its terms, all the power in the regulation of the colonial trade, and authorizes the President to confer on British subjects all those privileges, as well in the circuitous as the direct voyage, which Great Britain has at any time demanded or desired."

In this declaration the undersigned is happy to observe the same spirit and disposition which dictated Mr. McLane's former communications, wherein he announced the readiness and desire of the American Government "to comply with the conditions of the act of Parliament of 1825," and, also, "that the claims advanced in justification of the omission of the United States to embrace the offers of this country, have been abandoned by those who urged them, and have received no sanction from the people of the United States;" and the undersigned readily admits, that, if the bill passed by the American Legislature be well calculated practically to fulfil the expressed intentions of its framers, it must have the effect of removing all those grounds of difference between the two Governments, with relation to the trade between the United States and the British colonies, which have been the subject of so much discussion, and which have constituted the main cause of the suspension of the intercourse by those restrictive acts of the United States which the American Government is now prepared to repeal.

The proposition now made by Mr. McLane for the revocation of the order in council of 1826, stands upon a ground materially different from that on which the same question was brought forward in the notes of Mr. Gallatin in 1827, and even in the more explanatory overtures of Mr. McLane, contained in his communications of December, 1829, and March, 1830.

Those several proposals were, all of them, invitations to the British Government to pledge itself, hypothetically, to the revocation of the order in council, in the event of a repeal of those acts of the American Congress which gave occasion to it. His Majesty's Government declined to give that prospective pledge or assurance, on the grounds stated in Lord Dudley's note of the 1st October, 1827. But the objections then urged are not applicable to the present overture. Provision has now been made by an act of the American Legislature, for the re-establishment of the suspended intercourse upon certain terms and conditions; and that act being now before his Majesty's Government, it is for them to decide whether they are prepared to adopt a corresponding measure on the part of Great Britain for that object.

The undersigned is ready to admit that, in spirit and substance, the bill transmitted by Mr. McLane is conformable to the view which he takes of it in the expression before quoted from his note of the 12th July; and that it is calculated, therefore, to afford to Great Britain complete satisfaction on the several points which have been heretofore in dispute between the two countries. He has also received, with much satisfaction, the explanation which Mr. McLane has afforded him verbally, in the last conference which the undersigned had the honor of holding with him, upon those passages in which the wording of the bill appears obscure, and in which it seems at least doubtful whether the practical construction of it would fully correspond with the intentions of the American Government, as expressed by Mr. McLane. But it is, nevertheless, necessary, in order to remove all possibility of future misapprehension upon so important a subject, that he should recapitulate the points upon which those doubts have arisen, and distinctly state the sense in which the undersigned considers Mr. McLane as concurring with him in the interpretation of them.

The first point in which a question might arise, is in that passage of the bill wherein it is declared, as one of the conditions on which the restrictions now imposed by the United States may be removed, "that the vessels of the United States, and their cargoes, on entering the ports of the British possessions, as aforesaid, (viz. in the West Indies, on the continent of America, the Bahama islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Somer islands,) shall not be subject to other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, or charges of any other description, than would be imposed on British vessels, or their cargoes, arriving in the said colonial possessions from the United States of America." It is not quite clear whether the concluding words, "from the United States of America," are meant to apply to the vessels of the United States, and their cargoes, in the first part of the paragraph, as well as to those of Great Britain or her colonies, in the latter part.

It can scarcely, indeed, have been intended that this stipulation should extend to American vessels coming with cargoes from any other places than the United States, because it is well known that, under the navigation laws of Great Britain, no foreign vessel could bring a cargo to any British colonial port from any other country than its own.

The next condition expressed in the act is, "that the vessels of the United States may import into the said colonial possessions from the United States any article or articles which could be imported in a British vessel into the said possessions from the United States."

In this passage it is not made sufficiently clear that the articles to be imported on equal terms by British or American vessels from the United States must be the produce of the United States. The undersigned, however, cannot but suppose that such a limitation must have been contemplated, because the clause of the navigation act already adverted to, whereby an American vessel would be precluded from bringing any article not the produce of America to a British colonial port, is not only a subject of universal notoriety, but the same provision is distinctly made in the act of Parliament of 1825, which has been so often referred to in the discussions on this subject.

It was also necessary that the undersigned should ask for some explanation of that section of the bill which has reference to the entry of vessels into the ports of the United States from the continental colonies of Great Britain in North America. These are not placed, in the terms of the act, on the same footing as the ships coming from the colonies of the West Indies.

With respect to the latter, the express provision made for the direct intercourse with those colonies, together with the simultaneous repeal of the several American acts which interdict, at present, the carriage of goods from the United States to West Indian ports, in ships having arrived from other ports in the British dominions, appears fully to warrant the expression before quoted, of Mr. McLane, "that the act would confer on British vessels all those privileges, as well in the circuitous as in the direct voyage, which Great Britain has at any time demanded." But, with regard to the continental colonies, there is merely a provision for "admitting to entry, in the ports of the United States, British vessels or their cargoes from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent, and north or east of the United States." It must, indeed, be presumed, that vessels from these colonies are intended to be admitted upon the same terms, in all respects, and to be entitled to the same privileges, as British ships from any other British colony.

The act of Congress requires, as a further condition, that, when the intercourse with the West India colonies shall be opened by Great Britain, "the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions or possessions shall be left on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it now is."

Although it may be most truly stated that there exists, at this time, no intention to make any alteration in the commercial policy of Great Britain, and equally that there is no disposition on the part of his Majesty's Government to restrict, in any measure, the commercial relations between this country and the United States, yet the positive condition to maintain unchanged, or upon any particular footing of favor, every part of our system of trade affecting our intercourse with America, could not, with propriety, be made the subject of any specific engagement connected with the renewal of the colonial intercourse. Whether that intercourse be renewed or not, it ought to remain at all times as free as it now is, both to the Government of Great Britain and to that of the United States, to adopt, from time to time, such commercial regulations as either State may deem to be expedient for its own interests, consistently with the obligations of existing treaties.

It is due to the candor with which the communications of Mr. McLane have been made on this subject, that the undersigned should be thus explicit in noticing the passage in the bill to which he has now adverted.

Mr. McLane, in his note of the 12th ultimo, has described and explained the material diminution which has been made in the duties payable in the United States on the importation of certain articles of colonial produce. This measure has been viewed by his Majesty's Government with sincere satisfaction, as indicating a disposition to cultivate a commercial intercourse with his Majesty's colonies, upon a footing of greater freedom and reciprocal advantage than has hitherto existed. But the undersigned must frankly state, that, in the general consideration of the question now to be determined, no weight ought to be assigned to the reduction of those duties, as forming any part of the grounds on which the re-establishment of the intercourse may be accorded to. Those changes are part of the general scheme of taxation which the American Government may, at all times, impose or modify, with the same freedom as that which Great Britain may exercise in the regulation of any part of its system of duties; and it is the more essential that his Majesty's Government should not contract, by implication, any engagement towards that of the United States with respect to such alterations, because his Majesty's Government have already had under their consideration the expediency of introducing some modifications into the schedule of duties attached to the act of Parliament of 1825, with a view more effectually to support the interests of the British North American colonies. To those interests, fostered, as they have incidentally been, by the suspension of the intercourse between the United States and the West Indies, his Majesty's Government will continue to look with an earnest desire to afford them such protection by discriminating duties as may appear to be consistent with the interests of other parts of his Majesty's dominions, and with a sound policy in the commercial relations of this country with all other States.

The undersigned has thought it desirable that this point should be distinctly understood on both sides, in order that no doubt should exist of the right of Great Britain to vary those duties from time to time, according to her own views of expediency, unfettered by any obligation, expressed or implied, towards the United States or any other country.

The undersigned adverts again with satisfaction to the verbal explanations which he has received from Mr. McLane of those passages in the act of Congress which have not appeared to the undersigned to be literally adapted to the provisions of the act of Parliament of 1825. He concurs with Mr. McLane in thinking that these will be found to have been merely apparent deviations from the conditions of that statute, because the whole of the recent proceedings of the American Government and Legislature in this matter have been manifestly and expressly founded upon a determination to conform to it. Any other view of the subject would be entirely at variance with the tenor of the several communications from Mr. McLane before adverted to, which have all been conformable to the explicit proposition contained in his note of the 12th December, 1829, "that the Government of the United States should now comply with the conditions of the act of Parliament of July 5, 1825, by an express law, opening their ports for the admission of British vessels, and by allowing their entry with the same kind of British colonial produce as may be imported in American vessels, the vessels of both countries paying the same charges; suspending the alien duties on British vessels and cargoes, and abolishing the restrictions in the act of Congress of 1823 to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British colonies; and that such a law should be immediately followed by a revocation of the British order in council of the 27th July, 1826, the abolition or suspension of all discriminating duties on American vessels in the British colonial ports, and the enjoyment, by the United States, of the advantages of the act of Parliament of the 5th July, 1825." It only remains, therefore, for the undersigned to assure Mr. McLane, that, if the President of the United States shall determine to give effect to the act of Congress, in conformity with the construction put upon its provisions both by Mr. McLane and by the undersigned, all difficulty on the part of Great Britain, in the way of a renewal of the intercourse between the United States and the West Indies, according to the foregoing proposition made by Mr. McLane, will thereby be removed.

The undersigned has the honor to renew to Mr. McLane the assurances of his highest consideration.

ABERDEEN.

LOUIS McLANE, Esq. &c.

Mr. Van Buren to Mr. McLane.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 5, 1830.

SIR: Your despatch of the 20th August was, on the 3d instant, received at this department, and, with its contents, laid before the President.

You will perceive by the enclosed proclamation, and instructions from the Treasury Department to the collectors of customs, that the President has adopted without reserve the construction given to the act of Congress of the 29th of May, 1830, by Lord Aberdeen and yourself, by accepting the assurance of the British Government, with the accompanying explanations, as a compliance with its requisitions, and by doing all that was necessary to carry the proposed arrangement into complete effect on the part of the United States. By virtue of the President's proclamation, and the operation of the act of Congress above referred to, our restrictive acts are repealed, and the ports of the United States opened to British vessels coming from any of the British colonial possessions mentioned in both sections of the act, upon the terms stated in that act, and in the accompanying instruction. The President does not doubt that, having thus giving effect to the arrangement on the part of this Government, that of Great Britain will, without delay, do what is necessary on its side to remove all existing obstructions to the renewal of the intercourse between the United States and the British colonial possessions referred to, according to the proposition submitted by you and accepted by that Government. He allows himself also to expect that the circumstance that the ports of the United States are forthwith open to British vessels, whilst the opening of those of Great Britain must await the action of the British Government, thus producing temporarily an unequal operation, will induce his Majesty's Government to give to the matter its earliest attention.

The President has derived great satisfaction from the candor and liberality which have characterized the conduct of his Majesty's ministers throughout the negotiation, and particularly in not suffering the inadvertencies of our legislation, attributable to the haste and confusion of the closing scenes of the session, to defeat or delay the adjustment of a question, with respect to the substance of which, and the interest of the two countries, in its adjustment, both Governments are now happily of one opinion. He cherishes the most lively anticipations of the solid benefits which will flow from the trade that is about to revive, as well as of the benign influence which the satisfactory removal of a long standing and vexatious impediment to the extension of their commercial intercourse is calculated to exercise upon the relations between the two countries. It is his wish that you should make his Majesty's Government acquainted with these sentiments, and assure it that he will neglect no opportunity which may present itself to prove his sincere desire to strengthen and improve those relations by every act within the sphere of his authority which may contribute to confirm the good understanding so happily established.

It is also to me a pleasing duty to express to you, as I am directed to do, the entire satisfaction of the President with your conduct on this important occasion. The untiring zeal, patriotic exertions, and great ability, which you have displayed in the difficult negotiation thus satisfactorily concluded, realize all the anticipations he had formed from the employment of your talents in this important branch of the public service, and entitle you to the thanks of your country. To these sentiments I beg leave to add the expression of my own unqualified approbation of all your acts since the commencement of your mission near the Government of Great Britain.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,

M. VAN BUREN.

LOUIS McLANE, Esq. Envoy Extraordinary, &c.

By the President of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, by an act of the Congress of the United States, passed on the twenty-ninth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty, it is provided, that, whenever the President of the United States shall receive satisfactory evidence that the Government of Great Britain will open the ports in its colonial possessions in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Soner islands, to the vessels of the United States, for an indefinite or for a limited term, that the vessels of the United States, and their cargoes, on entering the colonial ports aforesaid, shall not be subject to other or higher duties of tonnage or impost, or charges of any other description, than would be imposed on British vessels, or their cargoes, arriving in the said colonial possessions from the United States; that the vessels of the United States may import into the said colonial possessions, from the United States, any article or articles which could be imported in a British vessel into the said possessions from the United States; and that the vessels of the United States may export from the British colonies aforesaid, to any country whatever, other than the dominions or possessions of Great Britain, any article or articles that can be exported therefrom in a British vessel, to any country other than the British dominions or possessions aforesaid—leaving the commercial intercourse of the United States with all other parts of the British dominions or possessions on a footing not less favorable to the United States than it now is—that then, and in such case, the President of the United States shall be authorized, at any time before the next session of Congress, to issue his proclamation, declaring that he has received such evidence; and that, thereupon, and from the date of such proclamation, the ports of the United States shall be opened indefinitely, or for a term fixed, as the case may be, to British vessels coming from the said British colonial possessions, and their cargoes, subject to no other or higher duty of tonnage or impost, or charge of any description whatever, than would be levied on the vessels of the United States, or their cargoes, arriving from the said British possessions; and that it shall be lawful for the said British vessels to import into the United States, and to export therefrom, any article or articles which may be imported or exported in vessels of the United States; and that the act entitled "An act concerning navigation," passed on the eighteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, an act supplementary thereto, passed the fifteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, and an act entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British ports," passed on the first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-three, shall, in such case be suspended or absolutely repealed, as the case may require:

And whereas, by the said act, it is further provided, that, whenever the ports of the United States shall have been opened under the authority thereby given, British vessels and their cargoes shall be admitted to an entry in the ports of the United States, from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent, and north or east of the United States:

And whereas satisfactory evidence has been received by the President of the United States, that, whenever he shall give effect to the provisions of the act aforesaid, the Government of Great Britain will open, for an indefinite period, the ports of its colonial possessions in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Somer islands, to the vessels of the United States, and their cargoes, upon the terms, and according to the requisitions, of the aforesaid act of Congress:

Now, therefore, I Andrew Jackson, President of the United States of America, do hereby declare and proclaim that such evidence has been received by me; and that, by the operation of the act of Congress passed on the 29th of May, 1830, the ports of the United States are, from the date of this proclamation, open to British vessels coming from the said British possessions, and their cargoes, upon the terms set forth in the said act; the act entitled "An act concerning navigation," passed on the 18th of April, 1818, the act supplementary thereto, passed the 15th of May, 1820, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British ports," passed the 1st of March, 1823, are absolutely repealed; and British vessels and their cargoes are admitted to an entry in the ports of the United States, from the islands, provinces, and colonies of Great Britain, on or near the North American continent, and north or east of the United States.

Given under my hand, at the city of Washington, the 5th of October, in the year of our Lord 1830, and the fifty-fifth of the independence of the United States.

ANDREW JACKSON.

By the President:

M. VAN BUREN,
Secretary of State.

Circular to the Collectors of Customs.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
October 6, 1830.

SIR: You will perceive by the proclamation of the President, herewith transmitted, that, from and after the date thereof, the act entitled "An act concerning navigation," passed on the 18th of April, 1818, an act supplementary thereto, passed the 15th of May, 1820, and an act entitled "An act to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain British ports," passed on the 1st of March, 1823, are absolutely repealed; and the ports of the United States are opened to British vessels and their cargoes coming from the British colonial possessions in the West Indies, on the continent of South America, the Bahama islands, the Caicos, and the Bermuda or Somer islands; also, from the islands, provinces, or colonies of Great Britain on or near the North American continent, and north or east of the United States. By virtue of the authority of this proclamation, and in conformity with the arrangement made between the United States and Great Britain, and under the sanction of the President, you are instructed to admit to entry such vessels, being laden with the productions of Great Britain or her said colonies, subject to the same duties of tonnage and impost, and other charges, as are levied on the vessels of the United States, or their cargoes, arriving from the said British colonies. You will, also, grant clearances to British vessels for the several ports of the aforesaid colonial possessions of Great Britain, such vessels being laden with such articles as may be exported from the United States in vessels of the United States: and British vessels, coming from the said British colonial possessions, may also be cleared for foreign ports and places other than those in the said British colonial possessions, being laden with such articles as may be exported from the United States in vessels of the United States.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. D. INGHAM,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Extract:—Mr. McLane to Mr. Van Buren, dated

LONDON, November 6, 1830.

I received on the 2d instant your despatch, number 22, of the 5th October, transmitting the proclamation of the President, and instructions from the Treasury Department to the collectors of customs, executing, on the part of our Government, the proposed arrangement with this, for the restoration of the direct intercourse with the British West Indies. I communicated these documents to the Earl of Aberdeen on the 3d instant, and have the honor to transmit herewith his answer thereto, and an order of the King in council, completing the proposed arrangement on the part of Great Britain, and fully closing the negotiation upon this important part of our relations.

This arrangement has already produced, and will continue to produce, considerable dissatisfaction in the British Northern provinces, and with those interests which have been incidentally fostered by the omission of our Government to comply with the terms of the act of 5th July, 1825, and the British order in council of July, 1826. It may be expected, therefore, as I have already stated in my former despatches, that some attempt will be immediately made to reconcile those interests to the restoration of the direct intercourse. Some of the duties in favor of the Northern productions will, doubtless, be increased, but others will be reduced. I cannot, however, at this moment, speak fully or with entire certainty of the intentions of this Government in that respect.

It may be proper for me to inform you, that, by the act of Parliament of the 2d July, 1827, entitled "An act to amend the laws relating to the customs," the importation of salted beef and pork is admitted into Newfoundland free of duty, and into all the other British ports at a duty of twelve shillings sterling the hundred weight. Under the present arrangement, by which the colonial ports are now opened to our vessels, we shall be entitled to the benefit of this act, and in that way acquire a valuable branch of trade, which we could not have enjoyed by the famous act of 5th July, 1825.

Mr. McLane to Lord Aberdeen.

9, CHANDOS STREET, PORTLAND PLACE,
November 3, 1830.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States, has the honor to transmit herewith to the Earl of Aberdeen, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, a proclamation issued by the President of the United States on the 5th of October last, and, also, a letter of instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, in conformity thereto, to the several collectors of the United States, removing the restrictions on the trade in British vessels with the ports of the United States and the colonial possessions of Great Britain. And the undersigned takes leave to add, that, although these papers appear to be sufficiently clear and explicit, he will take much pleasure in making any further personal explanation of their import that may be considered desirable.

It will be perceived, however, that, by virtue of the foregoing proclamation, and the operation of the act of Congress of the 29th May, 1830, the restrictive acts of the United States are absolutely repealed; that the ports of the United States are open to the admission and entry of British vessels coming from any of the British ports mentioned in both sections of the said act, with the same kind of British colonial produce as may be imported in American vessels, and upon the same terms; that the alien duties, in the ports of the United States, on British vessels, and their cargoes, and also the restrictions in the act of the Congress of the United States of 1823 to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British West India colonies, are abolished.

The undersigned has the honor to state further, that these acts have been performed by the President in conformity with the letter of the Earl of Aberdeen of the 17th of August last; and that, by accepting the assurance of the British Government, with the accompanying explanation, as a compliance with the requisitions of the act of Congress of the 29th May, 1830, and doing all that was necessary on the part of the United States to effect the proposed arrangement, he has adopted, without reserve, the construction put upon the act of Congress both by the Earl of Aberdeen and the undersigned.

In communicating these documents to the Earl of Aberdeen, the undersigned is instructed to inform him that the President has derived great satisfaction from the candor manifested by his Majesty's ministers in the course of the negotiation; and that, having thus given effect to the arrangement on the part of the United States, he does not doubt that Great Britain, acting in the spirit and terms of the proposition submitted by the undersigned, and accepted in the letter of Lord Aberdeen of the 17th of August last, will as promptly comply with those terms on her part, and remove the existing obstructions to the renewal of the intercourse between the ports of the United States and the British colonial possessions.

In conclusion, the undersigned takes leave to state, that, from the date of the proclamation of the President, the vessels of Great Britain have been and are actually in the enjoyment of all the advantages of the proposed arrangement, while the vessels of the United States are and must remain excluded from the same until the requisite measures shall be adopted by this Government. The undersigned has the honor to ask, therefore, that the Earl of Aberdeen will enable him to communicate the adoption of those measures to his Government, by the opportunity which will offer for that purpose on the 6th instant.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the Earl of Aberdeen the assurance of his highest consideration.

LOUIS McLANE.

The Rt. Hon. the Earl of ABERDEEN, &c.

Lord Aberdeen to Mr. McLane.

FOREIGN OFFICE, November 5, 1830.

The undersigned, his Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of Mr. McLane, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the United States at this court, of the 3d instant, in which he encloses a proclamation issued by the President of the United States on the 5th ultimo, and also a letter of instructions from the Secretary of the Treasury, in conformity thereto, to the several collectors of the United States, removing the restrictions on the trade in British vessels with the ports of the United States and the colonial possessions of Great Britain.

Mr. McLane observes, that, by virtue of the proclamation in question, and the operation of the act of Congress of the 29th May, 1830, the restrictive acts of the United States are absolutely repealed; that the ports of the United States are opened to the admission and entry of British vessels coming from any of the British ports mentioned in both sections of the said act, with the same kind of British colonial produce as may be imported in American vessels, and upon the same terms; that the alien duties, in the ports of the United States, on British vessels and their cargoes, and also the restrictions in the act of Congress of the United States of 1823 to the direct intercourse between the United States and the British West India colonies, are abolished.

Mr. McLane adds, that, in performing these acts, the President of the United States has adopted, without reserve, the construction put upon the act of Congress of the 29th of May, 1830, by himself, and by the undersigned in his note of the 17th of August last.

The undersigned having stated to Mr. McLane, in his above mentioned note, that, under such circumstances, all difficulty on the part of Great Britain, in the way of the renewal of the intercourse between the United States and the West Indies, according to the proposition made by Mr. McLane, would be removed, he has now the honor to transmit to Mr. McLane the accompanying copy of an order issued by his Majesty in council this day, for regulating the commercial intercourse between the United States and his Majesty's possessions abroad.

The undersigned cannot omit this opportunity of expressing to Mr. McLane the satisfaction of his Majesty's Government at the promptitude and frankness with which the President of the United States has concurred in the view taken by them of this question; and at the consequent extension of that commercial intercourse which it is so much the interest of both countries to maintain, and which his Majesty will always be found sincerely desirous to promote by all the means in his power.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to Mr. McLane the assurances of his highest consideration.

ABERDEEN.

LOUIS McLANE, Esq. &c.

AT THE COURT AT ST. JAMES',
November 5, 1830.

Present: The King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas, by a certain act of Parliament, passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Fourth, entitled "An act to regulate the trade of the British possessions abroad," after reciting that "by the law of navigation foreign ships are permitted to import into any of the British possessions abroad, from the countries to which they belong, goods the produce of those countries, and to export goods from such possessions to be carried to any foreign country whatever, and that it is expedient that such permission should be subject to certain conditions, it is therefore enacted, that the privileges thereby granted to foreign ships shall be limited to the ships of those countries which, having colonial possessions, shall grant the like privilege of trading with those possessions to British ships, or which, not having colonial possessions, shall place the commerce and navigation of this country and of its possessions abroad upon the same footing of the most favored nation, unless his Majesty, by his order in council, shall in any case deem it expedient to grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of any foreign country, although the conditions aforesaid shall not in all respects be fulfilled by such foreign country." And whereas, by a certain order of his said late Majesty in council, bearing date the 27th day of July, 1826, after reciting that the conditions mentioned and referred to in the said act of Parliament had not in all respects been fulfilled by the Government of the United States of America, and that, therefore, the privileges so granted as aforesaid by the law of navigation to foreign ships could not lawfully be exercised or enjoyed by the ships of the United States aforesaid, unless his Majesty, by order in council, should grant the whole or any of such privileges to the ships of the United States aforesaid, his said late Majesty did, in pursuance of the powers in him vested by the said act, grant the privileges aforesaid to the ships of the said United States, but did thereby provide and declare that such privileges should absolutely cease and determine in his Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and South America, and in certain other of his Majesty's possessions abroad, upon and from certain days in the said order for that purpose appointed, and which are long since passed: And whereas, by a certain other order of his said late Majesty in council, bearing date the 16th of July, 1827, the said last mentioned order was confirmed: And whereas, in pursuance of the acts of Parliament in that behalf made and provided, his said late Majesty, by a certain order in council, bearing date the 21st day of July, 1823, and by the said order in council, bearing date the 27th day of July, 1826, was pleased to order that there should be charged on all vessels of the said United States which should enter any of the ports of his Majesty's possessions in the West Indies or America, with articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the said States, certain duties of tonnage and of customs therein particularly specified: And whereas it hath been made to appear to his Majesty in council, that the restrictions heretofore imposed by the laws of the United States aforesaid upon British vessels navigating between the said States and his Majesty's possessions in the West Indies and America have been repealed, and that the discriminating duties of tonnage and of customs heretofore imposed by the laws of the said United States upon British vessels and their cargoes, entering the ports of the said States from his Majesty's said possessions, have been also repealed; and that the ports of the United States are now open to British vessels and their cargoes coming from his Majesty's possessions aforesaid: His Majesty doth, therefore, with advice of his privy council, and in pursuance and exercise of the powers so vested in him as aforesaid, by the said act so passed in the sixth year of the reign of his said late Majesty, or by any other act or acts of Parliament, declare that the said recited orders in council of the 21st day of July, 1823, and of the 27th day of July, 1826, and the said order in council of the 16th day of July, 1827, (so far as the such last mentioned order relates to the said United States,) shall be, and the same are hereby, respectively revoked: And his Majesty doth further, by the advice aforesaid, and in pursuance of the powers aforesaid, declare that the ships of and belonging to the United States of America may import from the United States aforesaid, into the British possessions abroad, goods the produce of those States, and may export goods from the British possessions abroad, to be carried to any foreign country whatever.
